What to Wear To School, Problem

There's funny weather these days and something that must be faced. Fill the youngsters up on good solid fall weather breakfasts, send them to school in air that smacks of a visit from Jack Frost, and see the little things come panting home in mid-afternoon under a sun that threatens a heat wave.

We never know just how long frosty effects will remain in the air, and Oregon has been known to play tricks on mothers and send down a few drops of moist rain, just as school doors open. So the best bet's to dress the child in layers, so peeling off a coating or two will produce no bathing beauty effects.

Sweat shirts (bless 'em) are those best bets for easy peeling. Cute little colored affairs zip up the front, to make dressy but easily removed garments. The striped numbers are cutest from a grown-up's point of view, but the Mickey Mouse and Lone Ranger affairs seem most popular with children.

Girls jumper dresses, rigged up with a white or light blouse, with a spare wrap of either a fuzzy white cotton zippered jacket, or a thin wool affair, make practical garments for girls. Plaids really make the woman, when she's about 6 to 12. And nice looking plaids were having this season.

Plaids are made into clothes for the younger set ranging from tiny mites up through the high school age girl. For those younger ones that have not graduated to woens as yet, there are dark red and blue plaids in cotton gingham, made into jumpers just like big sister's. And by the way, the Scotch influence is seen in perky little caps to match dresses. Older girls will be gowned in any choice of authentic plaids of wool, designed into jumpers or shirtmaker dresses. Jumpers have gained style these past two years, and variety of effects is gained through white, embroidered or colored blouses.

Some mothers are spending their recreational moments clicking out cute jumpers on their best knitting needles. Several college and high school girls were seen this week wearing blue knitted jumpers with embroidered shoulder straps. Very clever and very easy to knit.
