New Ideas Built Into Dairy Barn Here

"Come and see my bosses at work," says E. A. Rhoten, Salem dairyman, "but you'll have to say behind the plate glass window in the observation room while they are milked in the parlor." Picture shows construction progressing on new barn being built by Rhoten to replace one razed by fire last August. It will actually have a glassed-off observation room for visitors and a "milking parlor."—(Statesman Staff Photo.)

Dr. Rahe Calls Speech Clinic

Correction Class to Be in Office of Head of Department

Dr. Herbert E. Rahe, head of the speech department at Willamette university, this week announces the opening of a clinic for speech correction in his office on the third floor of Waller hall.

Workmen Filling Large New Concrete

While much larger than the old barn—which in itself was considered one of the most modern in Oregon—the new one will not have much greater capacity. The new features of dairy handling are the reason.

Unique Features Provided in Design For E. A. Rhoten's New Dairy Plant

An ultramodern dairy barn replete with "milking parlor" "observation room" for visitors and other innovations is being built on the E. A. Rhoten farm near Roberts station to replace the large barn and subsidiary buildings which were destroyed by fire last August.

While much larger than the old barn—which in itself was considered one of the most modern in Oregon—the new one will not have much greater capacity. The new features of dairy handling are the reason.

Efficiency Stressed

Cleanliness and efficiency are stressed in the Rhoten barn arrangement. The cows will not only be clean when they are taken into the milking room but also no feeding will be done there. The attendants will have but a few steps to go in delivering the milk to the strainer room. From the latter room the milk will be run by gravity to the cooling room.

Restoration of Concerts Asked

Arguments for Summer Music Booked for Budget Meet

Argument for restoration of the customary $1000 appropriation for summer band concerts in the Salem city budget will be presented at the council meeting Monday night when the budget comes up for final action.

Members and friends of the municipal band contend it will not be possible to carry on the program with the $500 appropriation approved by the budget committee, and have pointed out that in addition to the concerts, the band gives its services free for many other civic events. A statement issued by friends of the band reads in part:

"Can it be possible that this beautiful capital city of our wonderful state of Oregon can no longer help maintain a city band?"

"For the past fifty years, ever since our beloved city was a small village, its successive city councils have set aside each year a modest sum for the purpose of encouraging and sustaining a city band. And on nearly all holidays and public occasions our citizens, young and old, have marched to its inspiring rhythm.

"The history of this musical organization is entwined with the history of our capital city in its remarkable growth from a small rural town to an imposing and beautiful metropolis. And do we all realize the important economic and cultural position that Salem is rapidly acquiring? Very few cities in all the world have a more attractive civic center than we have here in Salem, including the
