"Knight Errant"

By JACK McDONALD

stables, painted in the Eton blue and brown, the dapper-looking color. Here, from the carrying buckets, went about looking more like Pullman porters, in epic and span white uniforms.

She could see the floors of the stables. They looked as spotless as a perfect kitchen.

As they neared the end of the roadway, Heather saw that the stables were beginning to look more and more shabby.

Men with stubble beards were sticking their heads out to stare at Heather.

"Don't pay any attention to those roustabouts, Miss," advised Bassitt. "They're just riff raff."

No sooner had they arrived at the Bassitt stable than he had a suggestion to make.

"What do you say we take your colt out on the track for a little spin, Miss? I'll take the kinks out of his legs after that long ride down here."

"Oh, let's," Heather answered. There was a delay when they reached the track.

A battalion of Whitney horses were working en masse. They looked like troops of cavalry pounding down the backstretch together, ridden by exercise boys in uniform blue jerseys.

Heather watched, visioning a day when she would own a proud battalion of horses like this.

Bassitt at length turned to Dimples Draper, his baby-faced rider, saying:

"Hi, kid. Take this colt three-eighths and cut him loose. I want to see how fast he can run."

Heather stood on the track, entranced as Knight Errant came thundering by her.

Stop watches in their hands, a battery of clockers scurried back and forth from a perch at the top of the grandstand to verify the time. Three-eighths in 33 1-5! Yes, it was right. They all caught it.

"Who's that thing?" they asked each other, excitedly. "Never seen him before. Might be that good one of Vanderbilt's."

"Boy, is that baby fleet of limb!" Brownie, the clocker purred. "There isn't another 2-year-old on the grounds that can warm him up."

"I've clocked 'em all, but I never laid eyes on one with early foot like that," chimed in Carter Hayes.

"Who is he?"

"Morlarity almost guessed it. 'Looks like the nearest thing to Coronado I ever saw,' he observed.

"It might be that get of his," Brownie mused. "I heard about a Coronado colt up north somewhere."

But, no, that couldn't be, they agreed, for there was Dimples Draper, Charlie Bassitt's rider, in the saddle and Bassitt wouldn't be having anything to do with the get of one as good as Coronado.

One thing you could make sure of. The newspapers would never get this workout.

It would go down in the clocker's little book of "goodies," to be wired around the country to their exclusive clients the very first time they saw this colt's name bob up in the overnight entries.

"Just put him down as 'the Black Demon,'" Brownie said. "We'll get his name later."

Thirty-three and a fifth! Bassitt couldn't believe his own stopwatch. The world's record was 32.

And just off the van! What would he do when he was legged up?

"Got a little speed, Miss," he told Heather deliberately. "Worked just fair. Pretty green colt. Going to have to be a lot of work done with him. A good handler might make something out of him, but I wouldn't get too high on him if I was you until you see him under real fire."

"Don't you think he shows promise?" she asked, disappointed in Bassitt's lack of enthusiasm.

The crafty Bassitt hid his excitement with a mild, "Yes."

Slim had seen Knight Errant work, had heard the clockers rave over his meteoric speed. Through glasses in the grandstand he studied Heather talking with Bassitt.

"Who are you laming, Slim, the girl or the horse?" Snapper asked.

"Neither one," Slim answered.
