Forest Method Faulty, Charge

Douglas Fir Region Worst now, Says Assistant to Federal Chief

WASHINGTON, Feb. 3.—Lack of forest practice in the United States is partially at fault for the feeling of private owners that they could show a profit only if they "cut everything within reach."

C. L. Forsling, assistant chief of the forest service, made this comment in testimony before the House appropriations committee considering the agriculture appropriation bill for 1941.

The official said that after private owners made their investment, they believed the only solution was to cut everything within reach, little trees as well as big, in order to liquidate the investment, and the result was the land was left in a devastated condition.

Forest service investigation, he added, showed that the owners could have kept forests in a productive condition by leaving smaller trees, which were taken out at a loss.

"We are up against that problem now in the Douglas fir region of the northwest, where we have one of the worst examples of clear cutting," Forsling said. "The hope is that by changing from railroad logging to tractor and truck logging, they will be able to leave young growth."

The late F. A. Silcox, chief of the service, also testified that "in the west a hotel which cost $32,000 was sold for $25,000 recently. The depleted resources behind that hotel is what knocked the bottom from under it. The disease spots are already appearing in Washington and Oregon where 65 cents of every dollar that circulates in Seattle, Portland and Tacoma comes out of wood."

"Now as to the whole problem of private land ownership," Silcox continued, "either we are going to find some way by which they can maintain it in private ownership so they can lay the foundation for continuous communities and sound loans for those communities or else we are going to spread the problem through much larger areas, going over into public ownership."
