From the frozen foods section of a current canner's magazine station of the Washington State college at Pullman.

Her findings were from actual experiments made in cooking the foods in various ways then scoring them accurately. Foods were judged for flavor, color, texture. and general quality of the products after cooked.

It was found that corn steamed three minutes was preferred. Corn on the cob was allowed to stand at room temperature for one hour, otherwise when steamed for 5 minutes the cobs remained cold. Less cooking on the cob produced corn with a cold cob, longer than five minutes and the cobs were water soaked.

Peas were judged best when either steamed or boiled for 6 minutes and allowed to stand in their liquid for 2 minutes before being drained. This standing plumped the vegetable. Steaming, it was found, produced a better looking product but with less of a fresh flavor then peas boiled. Hence most judges preferred the
