Front Street Construction Will Start Near Steel Bridge, With Ramps

First construction on Portland's $4,000,000 front street highway project will involve the 5600-foot section from Columbia street to Steel bridge, the state highway commission decided at a special meeting here yesterday.

This construction would include ramps to the Morrison and Hawthorne bridges which will take off from the highway and to the Steel bridge, which will carry traffic to the east side.

Chairman Henry Cabell said that actual construction would not start on any part of the project until the highway commission has completed negotiations for rights-of-way on the Columbia street-Steel bridge section and has received from the Union Pacific railroad company a long-term lease for permission to use the Steel bridge.

The new highway will be six-lane and will replace the present Pacific highway through Portland.

The commission announced that negotiations for the rights-of-way and permission to use the Steel bridge would get under way within a few days with Cabell in charge.

At a meeting of the commission in Portland June 13 the new project will be included on the state highway system and application will be made to place it city emergency crew and taken to the Salem General hospital.

on the federal system. The entire project will cover 3.6 miles. Of the $3,000,000 required for the purchase of rights-of-way the voters of Portland last Friday authorized a bond issue of $1,200,000. The state has set aside $800,000 for this purpose. The actual construction costs, also aggregating $2,000,000, will be divided between the state and federal government.
