Will Look Back Gratefully on "Democratic" Choice Spencer Avers

and predicted that the young men called for training will enjoy it or, at the least, look back upon it later with pleasure and gratification. The inconvenience of spending a year in defense service will diminish in the future as young men take into account in their personal plans the necessity of devoting a year to military training.

Recognition of men's duty to defend their nation is as old as government itself but the method of organizing them for that duty has evolved gradually and this law is its high point, the speaker asserted. Democracies have come to distrust the institution of a standing, professional army but until now, they have neglected the need of citizen army training, essential because mechanization of warfare has made untrained militiamen worse than useless.

The history of conscription in the United States in past wars is a catalogue of "what not to do," Major Spencer said. Troops under colony or state control failed in the Revolutionary war and the War of 1812; federal administration of the draft and the "exemption-buying" system failed in the Civil war. The World war draft was much better but faulty in its granting of total exemptions and its slightly inequitable system of determining quotas.

Conscription is the most democratic method of selection ever devised, the speaker insisted. He commended the manner in which all Americans are cooperating in the present program, including the men to be called, their employers and others.

The nation, Senator McNary declared, must "equate the price the farmer receives with the price he pays for what he purchases from those who live in cities." Senator McNary returned home Sunday night with Mrs. McNary, Traffic Toll now 54 who had gone to Sacramento to meet him Saturday.

Starting from Woodland, Wash., where Kingsbury cashed the first check at a drug store. the three swung south as far as Sacramento, Calif., and Valley Springs, Utah, before returning north on the eastern side of the Cascades. They also entered Nevada and Oregon.

Kingsbury, in a sworn statement to state police, said that he first met Bob Colvin when Colvin came to work on the Kingsbury presidential victory in those farm near McMinnville about September 23. Later he met the elder Colvin brother, Ralph, at the Colvin home at Rose Lodge.

Kingsbury said the older brother told him and Bob "how easy Pope Will Remain it was to get money by cashing checks." Several checks were cashed before big scale operations were started with acquisition of the check writing machine.

The first check written with the machine was cashed by Kingsbury at the Bledso feed store in Toledo and it is on that check that he is charged with forgery. Kingsbury was turned over to the Lincoln county sheriff yesterday to face prosecution there. Putting out checks ranging from $8 to $52 the three victimised merchants in Woodland, Wash., Linnton, Ore.; Toledo, Seaview, Wash.; The Dalles, Lakeview, Medford, Bandon, Coquille, where they cashed checks for $52 and $46, Sacramento, Oakland, Ore.; Eugene, Vernonia, Athena, and Vancouver, Wash., and other places which Kingsbury told police he could not remember.

The car used by the outfit, Kingsbury said, was obtained in Roseburg with a down payment made with money they had gained City Hall Polling from check writing. Police found the check protector used in the back of the car.
