

Air Conditioning at Capitol Discussed by Control Board

Air-conditioning the state's legislative chambers will not eliminate all complaints of the legislators, State Treasurer Leslie M. Scott declared at a meeting of the board of control Wednesday.

"I have been around the legislative halls in Oregon for 40 years and I have some knowledge of what is going on," Scott declared. "When these men come to the legislature their mode of living is changed. They eat different food, drink different water and sometimes stay up late at night."

The treasurer's remarks grew out of a discussion of the 1941 bill appropriating $55,000 to provide air-conditioning in the capitol, illness of many of the lawmakers at the 1941 session was one reason for passage of the bill. Scott and the other two board members, Gov. Charles A. Sprague and Secretary of State Earl Snell agreed that the capitol ventilating system should be improved.

Asylum Inmate Told Tale of Buried Gold—Notes—Guard Bit, Found None; but Ex-Inmate Proved Story True; He Had Been There First

By GLADWIN HILL

NEW YORK, May 28—(Special News Service)—Your Dizzy Digest today brings you a story about nuts—the slap-happy kind—and a joke that came to life.

A yarn has been rattling around the snapper story-telling circles of Manhattan about a guard in a bughouse who found one of the inmates industriously whitewashing the lawn with a big brush.

The housemaid's-knee Rembrandt, noticing the bailiff's bafflement, explained "I don't have to do this, you know—I've got a lot of money buried right near here."

The guard waxed interested and inquired into the matter.

"You go about a half-mile straight out from the gate," the screwball explained, "and you come to a big old oak tree about 50 feet high. You go 50 paces due west of the oak tree and there's a big rock, and down about 10 feet under the rock, I've got $50,000 buried in an oak cask."

As soon as he could get away, the guard hurried out and followed the formula. He found the oak tree, and the rock, and dug down under it, and found—nothing. So he went back to the asylum and reproached the white-washer for fibbing.

The inmate interrupted his brush-work. "Did you do it exactly?" he asked. "Did you go a half-mile from the gate to the oak tree, and 50 paces west of the rock, and dig down under the rock 10 feet?"

The guard said he had.

"And you didn't find the $50,000?"

"Nope," the guard said.

"Oke," rejoined the nut. "Get a brush!" (Laughter.)

All right, that's the story. All the sophisticated souls of giddy Gotham thought it was viddy funny, until the other day officials at the Kings Park state hospital out on Long Island disclosed that inmates suddenly had started going around flashing $20 and $50 gold certificates—those old-fashioned bills.

There was an investigation, and they traced down the source of the money to a local odd-job man who had contact with the inmates and who indeed had been at various times an inmate of the institution.

It turned out he was getting the bills from a big cache of money he had discovered, and kept quiet about, in an old abandoned building about a half-mile away.

That's the screwiest news today. Get a brush.
