A Dedication to College Days . . .

The last two weeks in September should be dedicated to college freshmen, and to all students who once were freshmen. Entering college with enthusiasm, a new student wants to be a success both scholastically and socially. The future seems exciting, mysterious.

But other students have emotions about college, too.

The sophomore is confident, anxious to exert a new-found power over the newer student. He is willing to give advice, superior, often forgets last year's inferiority.

The junior, settled in his major field confidently looks forward to two remaining years of college life. He almost forgets the trials of an underclassman.

The senior year in a college student's life is the best of all. He is wise, sophisticated, a hero. He returns to the campus, knowing it well. Meeting friends of other years, he talks over underclass experiences—then suddenly realizes that in the spring he will leave it all behind, and become a freshman in the outside world.
