

THE INSIDE—
in Washington!

By KIRKE SIMPSON
Wide World War Analyst For The Statesman

A startling and unexplained British set-back in Libya head-lines the war news. It makes North Africa an unknown quantity in both allied and axis strategy.

Resurgent German tank units under heavy air protection have stabbed eastward again nearly 100 miles to retake Agedabia, offensive advance base of the British. The news obviously jarred London spokesmen. There and in Cairo the battered axis forces under Nazi General Rommel had been represented as whittled down to rearguard defense line, able only to delay, not to halt, the British annihilation drive.

Yet they have leaped eastward and according to Cairo accounts, they have encountered only British "light forces." A similar attack in the same region last year precipitated a retreat that threw the British almost out of Libya.

There was no mystery about that. In a futile effort to save Greece from axis conquest, Britain left little more than a token force to hold Libyan gains and scaled down her air and sea blockade in the Mediterranean waist line, the Sicilian straits. The British gambled with Libya and lost.

That they have similarly gambled with Singapore, even Australia, and already lost HongKong, is the charge raised against Prime Minister Churchill by his parliamentary critics. A full-dress war debate, to be capped by another vote on Churchill's war leadership, is impending.

The loss of Agedabia, unless it can be explained on high strategy grounds will add to the heat of the London war debate. It is possible the Libyan retreat can be so explained. The British still hold Bengasi and the Libyan hump, which are important as air bases implementing British control of the central Mediterranean.

Pressure upon both London and Washington for effective allied reinforcement of Pacific and China sea bastions has been increasingly heavy as British back-stepping down the Malaya peninsula went on unchecked. The only allied bright spots in the far Pacific are General MacArthur's stand on Luzon, and American, Dutch and Chinese counter blows by air and sea.

British retreat in Libya to yield Agedabia back to the axis could mark a strategic move. The main British army in Libya obviously must be standing somewhere west of Bengasi and the Libyan hump, possibly with new orders.

If that is what deployment of only "light" British forces about Agedabia means, it would be significant. The explanation would be the transfer of empire forces from the Near East and Mediterranean to bolster allied defense resources in the south Pacific battle zone.
