War Changes Crop Outlook

Price Support for Tomatoes, Flax Seed Promised

War conditions and various governmental actions are greatly affecting the outlook in 1942 for spring planted crops in Oregon, reports the state agricultural exlension service in the current review of production and market prospects.

Among the spring crops of commercial importance in Oregon, governmental price support has been assured for corn, sugar beets, dry beans, dry field peas, canning peas, canning tomatoes, certain cover crop seeds and flax seed.

The report just issued also reviews the prospects for what, feed grains, hay, fiber flax, hops, potatoes, and miscellaneous vegetable crops. While most of these crops are included in increased production goals this year, wheat is expected to show a decrease of some 10 per cent in this state, according to the report.

The carry-over of wheat in the nation on July 1, 1942, may be as much as 600,000,000 bushels, even though it is now expected that the release of stored wheat for feed purposes will bring an increase in the use of wheat for feed of around 30,000,000 bushels.

Data included in the report on price levels show that, while the general level of farm prices in Oregon has risen rapidly during the past year to a point about equal to that prevailing during the 1926-1930 period, it still is much below the first World war period of 1919.

Despite the fact that farm prices in the United States as a whole are one-half higher than during the 1910-14 period, the exchange value or purchasing power of farm products is now about at "parity." This is because the level of prices which farmers must pay for commodities, taxes, interest, and wages is also far above that of the 1910-14 period.

The report was prepared by L. R. Breithaupt, extension agricultural economist at OSC, from federal and state statistics. Copies are available from county agents or direct from the college

Egg Production Increase Told

Total egg production in Oregon during January is estimated at 35,000,000 or 9 per cent more than the 32,000,000 laid in January last year. The increase is due chiefly to a higher rate of laying, but there are also more layers on hand than there were last year at this

The rate of lay has been higher than that of a year earlier during the past several months. In January it is estimated that 1,166 eggs were produced per 100 layers. This compares with 1,000 in January 1941 and 998 in December. The number of layers on hand during January averaged 3,100,000 compared with 2,910,000 during January last year.
