British Find Fire Pumps Inadequate

The experience of British fire fighters is revising British ideas as to the effectiveness of the stirrup pump for incendiary bombs, according to Percy Bugbee, general manager of the National Fire Protection Association. The stirrup pump is referred to as "time-wasting and labor-wasting" in the official journal of the British fire service, "Fire," for March, 1942. Another comment made in this publication is that "The ministry of home security has now come to the conclusion that the necessity for speed in dealing with a number of bombs falling simultaneously on a target and adjoining risks, requires the use of jets and not spray from stirrup pumps. This in itself points to the fact that the stirrup pump—which requires almost as many people to put it to work as a motor pump—does not work as fast as a motor pump, especially when the incendiary bombs are released in large numbers."
