To Market to Market, Hiking or Pedaling

Top left, pastel culottes; below, dual-control culottes; right, slacks suit

The days of long motor trips being over for the present, the American woman must go to market by hiking or peddling on her trusty bicycle. These activities require practical clothes that are, in their newest presentations, as smart as they are useful. At the top of our picture is a white culotte suit. It is fashioned of crisp, washable rep, made from spun rayon, and comes in many flower tones—blues, pinks, greens, yellows and other becoming pastels. Below is what is called the "dual-control culottes," perfect for the gal who bicycles to work or market. The secret in dual-control is in the snap closure which are invisible when the garment is on, and when snapped up makes it into a skirt. The culottes are navy blue, worn with a white or pastel colored blouse. The slacks suit, right, is beautifully tailored with patch pockets on the jacket and a fly-front closing. These suits are best in light, neutral colors, such as gray or beige, with a bright splash of accessory, stripes or plaids of kerchief and moccasins.
