"Random Harvest"

By JAMES HILTON

(Continued from Page 4) the pale fog he saw a tram an proaching, clanging continuously as it discharged a load of yelling school-children. He turned away from the clamor into a side street where two rows of small houses reached upwards like fly-ing buttresses astride a hill; pre-sently he came to a house with a dingy brass plate outside—"H.
T. Sheldrake, Teacher of Music."

The war asylum inmate spoke the name, Sheldrake, to himself -he always tested names like this, hoping that some day one of them would fit snugly into an empty groove in his mind. No, not Sheldrake. There was the sound of a piano playing scales; he listened, calming himself somewhat, till playing stopped and shrill voices began. That made him move on up the hill, but he felt tired after a short distance and held to a railing for support. Just then the same girl caught up with him.

"What's the matter?" He smiled. "I followed you. Thought you looked a bit off-color." He shook his head valiantly, observing her now for the first time. She was dressed in a long mackintosh and a little fur hat, like a fez, under which brown straight hair framed a face of such friendly eagerness that he suddenly felt it did not matter if she saw and heard his struggles for speech; rather that than have her think him worse than he was. He wanted to say: You should see some of the other fellows up there- what's wrong

RAF Bombs Blast Italian Sub

An RAF Sunderland patrol bomber surprised an Italian submarine cruising on the surface of the western Mediterranean. The ill-fated Axis craft is completely hidden by the bursting of a "stick" of bombs dropped by the plane (top). The damaged submarine is shown making frantic efforts to escape while machine gun bullets from the attacking bomber kick up spray around it (bottom).

with me is nothing-just a stammer and not being able to remember things.

While he was planning to say all this she took his arm. "Lean on me if you like. And talk or not, whichever you want. Don't be nervous."

After that he decided to say merely that he was not really ill, but only tired after walking further than usual; he began bracing himself to make the effort, smiling beforehand to console her for the ordeal of watching and listening. Then a curious thing happened; it was like taking a rush at a door to break through when all the time the door was neither locked nor even latched. He just opened his mouth and found that he could speak. Not perfectly of course, but almost as easily as if he were talking to himself. It made him gasp with an astonishment so overwhelming that for the moment he expected her to share it. "Did you hear that? I wasn't so bad then, was I?" "Of course you weren't. Didn't I tell you not to be nervous?" "But you don't know what a job I have as a rule." "Oh yes I do. I heard you in the shop. But that old woman would scare anybody. Where d'you want to go?"

"I don't know."

right?" "Oh yes." "I've heard they're a bit rough with some." "Not with me."

"All the same, you don't really 'like the place?' "Not-not very much." "Then you oughtn't to be in it surely?"

"There's nowhere else, until I get all right again." "How can you get all right again when you're not happy in a place?" He had often asked himself the same question, but he answered, parrying the idea: "Perhaps I wouldn't be happy anywhere-just now." "But the war's over-doesn't that make any difference?" She came near to abrupt tears, then dashed a hand to her eyes and began to laugh. "Silly, that's what I am-everybody's gone silly today. Seems an awful morning to end the war on, doesn't it - I mean you'd simost blue skies-like a picture . . . She almost cried again: "Shall we stroll down?" She gripped his arm as they slowly descended the hill. His walk was pretty good, and he was suddenly proud of it—just the faintest shuffle, nobody would notice. When they reached the piano teacher's house he hesitated. "I'd rather not get mixed think the sun ought to shine-

up with the crowd-if you don't mind." (To be continued)
