"Atta girl." They were in front of her home. She turned in. "Look your prettiest," he

"I'll try," she said, but as she went up her walk she was not at all easy in her mind. She was more than uneasy. She was suffering from an acute attack of uncertainty and premonition. . . Darnley was posing upon an improvised model's stand. She thought she had never been so tired in her life. Her back ached; her neck burned; her knees trembled. She did not know how long she had been standing there, and Peter Orrick had forgotten, in his concentration. Had she been a professional model she would have demanded a rest long before this, but, in her ignorance, she believed this was the way models had to do. In the beginning she had been embarrassed. But Peter Orrick there," he said peremptorily, pointing to the stand. "Just stand a second while I think." He stood back and stared at her, and her embarressment departed. Orrick was not seeing Darnley Carfax; he was seeing a hundred and ten pounds of beauty that was nameless and sexless. He strode to her. He moved her about as he would have moved a bit of bric-a-brac on his piano. After ten minutes he was
