Canteen Workers Find Day Long, When Food Nearly Runs Out

By MARGARET GLEASON

"It was the end of the beginning" Sunday night at the USO canteen, and the workers there were so busy they did not have time to say "Jack Robinson" let alone say the British Prime Minister was right when he voiced those words about the end and the beginning one short week ago.

The checkers upstairs said that 782 men had already come into the USO, but canteen workers swore there were at least 2000, if cramped toes and a desperate food situation was any indication.

When the day was over and feet were somewhat rested, inventory revealed that on this third-Sunday-of-the-month, soldiers ate 26 loaves of sandwich bread, and 64 dozen doughnuts (the last 36 dozen retrieved at 8:30, last from a baker's shelves).

What did they use for sandwich spread? Well, spareribs for one thing, spareribs left by the Spinners in the morning. Meat was stripped from the bone, and when someone called for a meat grinder, a helpful man canvassed the neighborhood and brought back a borrowed one. A jar of mustard and a few walnuts made "the best sandwiches they ever ate."

It was a "military secret" how many cups of coffee were served but, "That's good coffee ma'am" was music to the ears of one worker who had vowed she'd learn to make coffee in quantities, "or else."

What do the women talk about at the canteen? Well, it's mostly about where the food will come from, if any more soldiers eat. But everyone's so busy there isn't much conversation. Later they talked about ways to improve technique.

Canteen workers, those on Sunday not from the big wage earning class, dig down in their pockets to replenish the fast-emptying cupboard. One worker went to her father's shop and brought back cheese, milk, and butter.

But it shouldn't be up to the workers to furnish food, it should be up to those who find no time available for working at the canteen. Women who have boys in service, boys who are eating sandwiches, cookies and cake at some other canteen, perhaps in New Jersey or Texas or Georgia.

From behind the counter, those tired workers on Sunday, imagined the many Salem families, dining at home from a well-filled table, and thought that if each family, with a boy in service, would furnish the same amount of food he was eating somewhere else, our local canteen would be well stocked. Cookies and cakes or meat or pickles, even left over from a meal, would go a long way to filling the counter at the canteen.

The most welcome persons during the day were women bringing in promised cakes, cookies, and pies. The most welcome later, was Bob Boardman, blinking the lights at 10:30 to clear the rooms for another day.

Who are the workers in the canteen? The third-Sunday group includes a hospital staff nurse and a medical technician, an abstract office examiner, two secretaries of state supreme court justices, two newspaper women, a university faculty member, a teacher in the public schools, a worker in the social security office whose husband is presumably in Africa, and a housewife whose husband has been on hand each Sunday to act as errand boy, and who has been hailed as a friend indeed.

This group is but one of 50 serving once a month at the canteen, under the general direction of Mrs. Walter Spaulding who has charge of keeping supplies of soft drinks and cigarettes (among the few things not free to the soldiers). Mrs. Spaulding stands by to fill in, if some group fails to appear.

The big problem now that demand has increased, is to keep the food coming into the canteen. Women who have been regularly furnishing sweets, have now exhausted their available time and materials. Others must volunteer, if the work is to be kept up.

And say, if any one has an extra kitchen stool, a moderately high one, they'll relieve exhausted sandwich makers, who find chairs too low, and feet too frail for day-long use.

Mrs. Eric Butler will review, "Sing of Bernadette" by Franz Wefel, at the meeting of the Book-a-Month club today. The hostess, Mrs. Roy A. Mille, 1474 Court street, will serve a dessert luncheon.

Photographs On Display

The exhibition of photographs, taken by Minor White before his induction into the army, now showing at the Salem Art and Recreation center, is being received with enthusiasm by servicemen and townspeople who visit the soldier center.

The exhibit includes photographs of old Portland homes, waterfront and street scenes, characteristic of Portland and the northwest. An interesting camera study of logs floating down the Willamette is illustrative of the part that lumber plays in the industrial life of this region.

The show includes closeups of anchors, chains, tools, driftwood and architectural detail in Minor White's own manner—sharply focused objects seen at close range and in natural lighting, no trick shots, put great effects through as a simple, direct and forceful approach.

Minor White's work is familiar to many friends of the Salem Art center, as it was exhibited in the center galleries at various times, while White was staff photographer for the WPA art project. The portfolios containing White's photographic work for the WPA are now at the Portland Art museum as an indefinite loan from the United States government.

White's work was presented in a large one-man show at the Portland Art museum in February and again in June. A group of his pictures is on view at the California Palace of the Legion of Honor in San Francisco during the month of November.

Fashion Blackout for Legs

By DOROTHY ROE

Wide World Fashion Editor

Well, here it is, girls. Prepare for a blackout on legs. Heavy black rayon stockings are the newest things on the hosiery front, shattered and blitzed these many months by the disappearance of silks and nylons, shortages of cottons, temperamental quirks of rayons.

No less a personage than Valentina, top-flight dressmaker to some of the world's "ten best-dressed," launches the new stocking fashion, and proves her good faith by being the first to appear in the kind of opaque black stockings that mother used to save for Sunday best.

The alert designer told me six months ago that heavy black, dark brown and navy blue stockings would grace the most fashionable legs before long, and here they are.

She felt, said Valentina, that naked-looking legs looked wrong with wartime clothes.

The stocking industry, bloody but unbowed beneath the bludgeonings of priorities, leaped on her words with cries of joy. They had known for long, sad weeks that sheer rayons presented many seemingly unsurmountable difficulties in regard to wearing qualities. If women would just wear heavy rayons, now— if somehow they could be made fashionable.

The new opaque stockings made their debut before a goggle-eyed fashion press at a recent hoity-toity soiree. They came in black, brown and navy, and believe it or not, have a slimming effect on the legs. They look exactly like the heavy silk stockings of yore, and help to prove the tradition of the stocking industry that its fashions go in cycles of 20 years.
