'Golden Lady' (Continued From Page 4) Chapter 13 I'll be very glad to explain why I did it.

Hixon rumbled in his throat and scowled at her. He half lifted his great ham of a hand as if to retaliate. Then his eyes narrowed.

Detective Lieut. Hixon turned his head, looking for reporters perhaps. Then to Darnley, "What's your name?" "Carfax."

"Well, Miss Carfax, maybe we didn't understand each other," he offered. Then, concisely, efficiently, without raising his voice or acting the bully, he questioned the two girls, and each of them answered, describing her movements from the time she arrived in the studio until she left it. Neither could throw the faintest light upon the method of abstracting the sable coat, nor supply a fact that could cast suspicion upon anyone.

Finally, Lieut. Hixon ordered: "Take them in your office, Mr. Farrish. I may want to question them again." As they went his eyes followed Darnley. "Now wasn't that sumpin'?" he demanded with grudging admiration. "Hey!" exclaimed Jerry Shatto when the office door closed behind them, "did you want to get us slung in the cooler?" "I didn't care," Darnley said. "I'd rather be in a cell than let that man talk to me that way."

"Well and weller!" ejaculated Jerry, "if you aren't quite a fellow!"

Farrish seated himself behind his desk and rested his head in his cupped hands.

"Are we downhearted?" asked Jerry. "Why the gloom? It wasn't your coat."

"No," said Farrish, "it wasn't my coat. And the price of it is forty thousand dollars—but I'm responsible for it."

"What?" asked Darnley. "Forty thousand smackers," repeated Farrish slowly. "This would be what they call the finish. It would be a couple of inches."

"Do you mean you'll have to pay for it?" Darnley asked. "Do you think Mead & Company will laugh it off?" he asked.

"If I were you," suggested Jerry, "I'd see my lawyer."

"Yes," said Darnley. He shook his head. "This torpedoes the ship," he said. I'm through!"

"It wasn't your fault," Darnley insisted. "Even if you do have to pay for it, maybe they won't make you pay all at once. Maybe they'll give you a long time."

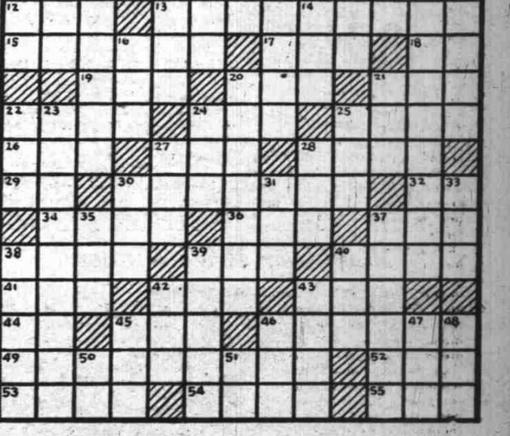

"The way business is going it would take forty thousand years," he said drearly.

"Not if you got the—" Darnley stopped abruptly. She was about to say, "Not if you got the Golden Blend business," but even Jerry must not hear about that. "Not," she amended, "if you got some advertiser to give you lots of work." She stopped and frowned. "It seems to me," she said, "like a funny thing to steal, and a funny thing to steal it."

"Eh? What do you mean?" "Do you remember the first time I posed for you—in the railroad station? I've been thinking a lot about that."

"Yes." "Somebody didn't wish you any good luck that day. Somebody wanted you to lose that piece of work. If someone would go to the trouble of hiring a
