Business in Stamps Good

By MAXINE BUREN

Salem high school Girls Letter club thought up a successful method of wresting cash for war bonds and stamps from other students, and did it painlessly a few weeks ago. For several weeks various clubs of the school have taken charge of the sale of stamps in the halls, with moderate success, but when the Girls Letter club arranged a stamp selling contest to choose a "Victory Girl," interest flared, and sales jumped away up.

Clubs were asked to put up candidates for the "Victory Girl" and votes were cast according to the number of stamps sold—the higher the denomination, the more votes in proportion. Sales jumped so high that on one day, more stamps were sold than in any other entire week. Stamps and bonds went into pockets of students at the rate of $4300 for the week, and with $3000 votes for the civics club candidate blonde Jean Rowland was chosen "Victory Girl" in a triumph that assumed almost landslide proportions, the runner-up candidate commanding only 2300 votes.

No campaigning was necessary, according to Jean, who even represented one of the smaller clubs of the school. Contests just naturally whet the imagination of students and inspire them to work to a goal. The fact that Jean is interested in many school activities and a popular student may have encouraged many independents to cast their votes for her.

To the credit of the winning club candidate went two $1000, one $500 and one $50 bonds, besides innumerable small stamp purchases.

Mrs. Grace Walgamott, director of the Girls Letter club, thinks this is a new idea in stamp selling contests, and has suggested it's a plan applicable to other high schools in the state.

The contest cost nothing, the qualifications for the "Victory Girl" of "patriotism, scholarship and citizenship activities and character" were excused enough for each student to vote for his own personal preference, and the promise of the winner ruling over all patriotic city and school activities whetted the patriotism of students with a few extra dimes or quarters in their pockets.
