was the hero and Gene Autry, star of radio and screen, the actor in the dramatized version of the flight of a flaming plane following a raid on Kiska, presented Sunday afternoon over a nationwide radio hookup.

The story told and acted on the Autry program was that of the second disaster to overtake a plane commanded by the Salem man. En route back to base after a successful day's work, the plane although damaged was navigable for a distance. Discovering that he was not going to be able to take his men in safely when the flames had burned away a portion of the ship, Wintermute ordered all to bail out, attempted to right the plane and to get it under control, then lost consciousness beside the controls.

Cries of his comrades, the men of his command, as they saw the plane hurling on, apparently out of control, and realized that their army air forces advanced flying captain had not taken the leap, were the prelude to the climax ler, Ariz., comes word that when they saw him fall, urged him Hagan, who attended Salem to pull the rip cord, and their shouts of joy when the 'chute

The broadcast, presented in St. Paul, Minn., was a tribute to men of the air service and the men and women in that city who fit out planes with arms.
