The pre-invasion pattern of attack on Italy became plainer for Mussolini to see as more American planes swept across the Mediterranean to wreck airfields at Villweidro and Decimomannu or Sardinia and to destroy the thinning axis air force on the ground and in the air.

Thirteen enemy fighters were shot down by American medium bombers and fighters and many more were turned into wreckage by thousands of pounds of fragmentation bombs showered on the two strategic airfields near Cagliari. British foreign secretary Anthony Eden said in a speech at Portsmouth that Italy. "now lies wide open to air attack," and the box score bore him out. Only one American Warhawk fighter was downed in the latest assaults, and Its pilot was saved.

Eden said: "It is for the Italian people to decide whether they are to endure this bombardment to the bitter end and when it is to stop," He said the allies' antisubmarine campaign "continues to be encouraging." Informed sources in London declared the U-boat menace not only was being held, but smashed, and pointed out that even the German claims of sinkings had been drastically reduced from a year ago.
