How the Moslem habit of not looking on the face of the dead held up a manslaughter trial in court martial on African soil is described by Capt. Claude M. Johns, former bailiff of the state supreme court here in a letter to the court justices received Monday.

Because the father of the slain youth could declare his son dead only by hearsay, the uncle could only say that he understood the boy was dead, and so on down a list of relatives, the court martial proceedings, although commenced in good faith, were delayed until it was discovered that the undertaker had known the moslem youth and was able to testify as to the identity.

Johns has been overseas 10 months.

In that part of the world from which "Trader Horn" set out upon his commercial expeditions, a young man from Salem won recognition for his bartering abilities, stories reaching the capital city indicate.

Ensign Steve Anderson, whose ability as a salesman earned him his way through Willamette university liberal arts and law colleges, put together a little of this and that, including long underwear, and traded with natives of north Africa for as much as he could carry back to his quarters in the way of an Arabian rug and other oriental treasures.

Anderson, who has written friends here that he had hoped by similar means to come to "own Tunisia," a large portion of which he planned to give to his Uncle Sam, was transferred to Sicily before he could gather together enough material to start the trade. And for Sicily, he claims, he would give very little, although he describes his "air raid" type shelter close to the Mediterranean as "comfortable" and attractive.

Anderson, former Young Republican club organizer for the state, called the Wendell Wilkie residence while he was in New York ready to take ship, friends here relate. He found Mrs. Wilkie a fine telephone conversationalist and was definitely disappointed when he and Mrs. Anderson could not accept the lady's invitation to dinner because he was to report for duty that afternoon.
