Our forces are on the move beyond the Pacific and beyond the Atlantic. They are doing their job superbly. Ours is to continue to produce, continue to save. Be ready for victory. Buy more and more War Bonds. U. S. Treasury Department

HOW PORTLAND GAS IS HELPING TO SPEED WAR PRODUCTION

The next plane you see is likely to contain parts made by Columbia Aircraft Industries

GAS heat treating makes these parts tough and durable...

HERE IS THE STORY: On every battle-front and scores of training fields are planes containing parts produced by Columbia Aircraft Industries of Portland. And gas is vitally important in their production... because aluminum alloys must be very carefully heat treated to give them the optimum qualities needed to stand up under all flying and fighting conditions.

GAS supplies even, dependable heat

One step in the processing of aluminum alloys at Columbia Aircraft Industries is their dipping in the "salt bath", a vat of molten sodium nitrate that is kept constantly at 950 degrees Fahrenheit.

So important is this temperature—for it changes the internal structure of the metal and greatly increases its toughness and strength—that a variation of over 4 degrees is not permitted. Even delicate foods like angel cake and souffles can stand greater variations of temperature without ill effects. But in heat treating aluminum alloys, the same as with baking angel cakes, gas can be depended on to maintain constantly the exact temperature desired.

Why are you asked to conserve gas? Gas is used in many other ways by Columbia Aircraft Industries. In fact, the gas required by this one war production plant alone would heat 30 average homes or cook meals for 2000 families. And it is to insure that this industry... and other war industries and military establishments... will always have all the gas needed for vital war activities that you are asked to avoid waste of gas in your home.

GAS IS WAR MATERIAL Use it wisely!
