Mrs. Everest Held Innocent

One Juror Refuses To Sign Verdict in False Oath Case

Eleven jurors agreed upon a verdict of "not guilty" after 25 minutes deliberation Wednesday in the case of Myrtle Everest, tried in circuit court here before Judge E. M. Page on a charge of false swearing. One juror declined to sign the verdict.

In filing suit for divorce from Clayton Everest, the defendant had made an affidavit asserting that he was living outside of Oregon, whereas, the state contended, he was still living at Newberg where the couple had lived prior to separation, and that in fact he frequently patronized a restaurant in which she was employed as a waitress. The state insisted Mrs. Everest knew her husband was still living in Newberg, but falsified in order to obtain service by publication in Marion county in order that he might not know the case had been filed.

The divorce suit was filed in February and the divorce was granted in March of this year. It was testified that Everest came to the courthouse in Salem in August to inquire about the case; the state contended he had heard of the divorce only through hearsay.

Since that time the Everests have remarried and Clayton Everest denied, in testifying Tuesday, that he had been kept in ignorance of the suit's institution. He said he came in August to inquire whether any alimony had been allowed.

Defense counsel's argument before the jury was based chiefly on the contention that in signing the affidavit, Mrs. Everest had not been conscious that she did so under oath. The defense admitted the affidavit contained errors but argued that they might have been included due to a misunderstanding between Mrs. Everest and the attorney who prepared the instrument.
