What Is a Policy?

Last week Secretary Hull spent two hours and a half explaining, presumably in some detail, exactly what American foreign policy has been and is now to two-dozen "freshmen" congressmen. When he was through, according to the published quotations, his hearers admitted they enjoyed the conference, but denied that they knew much of anything more about foreign policy than when they went into the meeting.

Their story was that the gray, eminent secretary had much to say of what American policy had been, but very little about what it now is with respect to such things as the Badoglio government, the French Committee of National Liberation, and most important of all, the remnants of an ultimately defeated Germany.

The key to the whole thing, in fact, lay in a reference made by the president on the same day, when he declared in a highly superficial manner that some of the people are asking bellhops what our foreign policy is (the answers, to speak frankly, are probably as good as those the state department gives out), and then observed that he had himself stated American foreign policy recently in a proclamation on the Jewish refugee problem.

Yet the president's statement, like the 17 points of Secretary Hull issued a day or two before, was nothing more than a recapitulation of general affirmations which have been stock equipment for international utterances for as long as diplomacy has been carried on by the American government: that this nation believes in peace, in democracy, in the freedom and responsibility of the individual, and desires to establish these principles in international and national life throughout the world. It is the sort of thing on which everyone, from office boy to general manager, from private to general will agree; it is like saying you are against sin, or favor food to eat or air to breathe.

The essence of the problem is not that the United States believes in, and attempts to express in its foreign policy, a love of personal liberty; but that the United States, in this particular time, in this particular spring of 1944, at this particular juncture of the war, is unable to say whether it will or will not support the only French organization which bears the shadow of resemblance to a French government; that it is vacillating in deciding whether to jettison Badoglio or hoist him still higher; that it has only a hazy idea, and no plans for solidifying its views with other allied nations, on the vitally important future of Germany and central Europe. It is not to say that this particular solution of the French, or the Italian, or the German problem is the one which must be adopted in order that this nation may have a working foreign policy; it is to say that some policy must be adopted at this very present time which can be announced to the world and which the world can understand without the necessity of meetings in the State Department, and special addresses by the secretary. Something, in short, that the bell-hop can comprehend and repeat back when you, as John Public, ask him what it's all about. We cannot longer answer DeGaulle's justified desire that we say what we really think about the future of France with a rhetorical assertion that we are a democratic nation; and if we settle Germany's future with a denunciation of political infamy we are voluntarily assuming the role of mere spectator in regard to that nation's political future—if it has any when the Russians get through.

These things are vital. We have abandoned isolationism as a national policy, but we have put nothing in its place except hesitation, personal prejudices of the president, and the spotless generalities of the secretary of state. Unless we can translate some of our euphemistic phrases on international comity into action, here and now and without delay, our battle sacrifices are meaningless, and we find ourselves back where we started from—isolationist, not by conviction, but by default.

Interpreting The War News

By KIRKE L. SIMPSON

Political and military developments in the far Pacific combine to draw a startling picture of Japanese frustration on that flank of her over-extended China Sea conquest zone and tend to discount heavily the significance of the Tokyo heralded "invasion" of India from Burma.

In the light thrown on her situation by a Japanese diplomatic surrender to Russia coupled with Nipponese failure so far as yet known to offer substantial resistance to a strong American naval task force steb to within less than 500 miles of the Philippines, the India "invasion" episode can be written off. It gives little indication of having more than the nuisance value assigned to it by General Auchinleck, British commander in India. Japanese relinquishment of oil and other mineral concessions on the Russia half of Sakhalin island is hailed in Moscow as a sweeping diplomatic victory. Prior to Japan's conquest campaign southward which overran the oil-rich Dutch Indies and Burma, Sakhalin furnished much of her naval fuel. It was the only oil source under Japanese control.

A face-saving Tokyo explanation of surrender of exploitation rights on northern Sakhalin back to Russia is possible. Having seized far greater oil resources, it could be said that Sakhalin oil was no longer necessary to Japanese economy or war-making plans. The Sakhalin concession relinquishment cannot fool anybody but the Japanese people, least of all the Russians, who drive a hard bargain.

Moscow's greatest weapons in forcing Japan to make good on a promise she never expected to be called upon to keep, however, were Russian victories over German invaders and the steady advance of American forces through Nipponese Pacific defenses. Tokyo cannot risk friction with Russia. The peace status quo on her north flank is more urgently necessary for Japan now than it was for Russia when their non-aggression pact was signed with Nazi hordes poised to pour into Russia from the west.

No Congressional Generals

Several days ago the chairman of the house military affairs committee refused to schedule hearings on a bill by Rep. Sumner (R., Ill.) to postpone the invasion of western Europe, while at the same time stepping up the offensive in the Pacific.

The reason given was the perfectly sound and unassailable one that "the technical handling of the war and matters of strategy are matters that should be left in the hands of the army and navy." Chairman May, who made this statement, sagely added, "We (the congress) have no reason to undertake by legislation to tell them when and where to fight."

The history of past wars in which this and other countries have engaged has proved without exception that a war run for political profit, or by non-combatants who have themselves no immediate or personal responsibility for the conclusion of successful operations, is not only unsuccessful, but likely to be exceedingly damaging to the nation which overrules its field commanders in this way.

The Soviet Union, after the revolution of 1917, found that rule by committee even in the actual theater of operations did not work, and in this war has abandoned its system of political commissars. In the Civil war certain committees of congress undertook much greater supervision of field operations than has been true at any time since, and the result was to confuse and harass Lincoln and his generals to their considerable annoyance without contributing measurably to the victories of the Union.

Pacific Coast people are naturally anxious to get along with the war against Japan, but they realize that any robbing of Peter to pay Paul, at a time when the German enemy is being roundly thrashed to his knees, would, in the long run, be poor military economics, whether done by generals or by legislative bodies. The established priorities should be maintained, so that orderly planning of military operations can result in the earliest possible peace.

McNary Dam

It is pleasing to note how quickly colleagues of the late Senator McNary of Oregon seek to do him honor.

Senator Bailey, democrat of North Carolina, has introduced an amendment to the rivers and harbors bill naming the proposed $70,000,000 Umatilla dam between Oregon and Washington the McNary dam.

It was Senator McNary who led the successful battle in congress for construction of the Bonneville dam and when President Roosevelt penned his name to the bill authorizing this huge improvement, he smiled and said, "After all, it's Charlie's dam."

Further development of the potential power locked up in the Columbia will be loosed upon completion of the Umatilla dam and it is fitting that it bear his name.

Misfortune seems to pursue the state hospital, this time two inmates losing their lives in the cave-in of a ditch. Questions naturally arise over whether proper safety standards were being followed, which warrant an investigation. The tragedy is heightened by the heroism of young Allan Aplet who lost his life when he turned back to help an older worker trapped in the falling dirt. This display of courage merits the highest praise, even though his effort proved a vain sacrifice.

PIPE-LINE MYSTERY

And now the army and navy, with Secretary Knox leading off, are for Secretary Ickes' Arabian pipe-line cartel. Why the army and navy—We are told the joint chiefs of staff base their support on two points. One is that delay might cost the American oil companies their present domination of oil rights in Saudi Arabia. The other is that unless the project is started soon it will not be ready to deliver oil when the European post-war market opens.

What have either of these considerations got to do with the army or the navy? Since when did it become their affair that American oil companies should hang on to concessions on the other side of the world? Still less is the European post-war oil market their business. The war, one would think, should occupy their exclusive attention now, not post-war trade.

This pipe-line can hardly be for the purpose of winning this war. A thousand miles of pipe will not be laid across the Arabian desert in a hurry. Nor has it yet been made clear that oil has been developed in any quantity in Saudi Arabia. It should be borne in mind that the present producing wells in the joint ownership of Standard of California and the Texas company are not in Saudi Arabia, but on the British-controlled Bahrain islands in the Persian Gulf, with water transport at the well-head. The California Arabian company may have reason to think oil lies under their concessions in Saudi Arabia, but a measured flow would be the best proof.

Secretary Knox talks about this pipe line as a provision for the next war? Would not something depend on where that war happens to lie? Conceivably, this distant source might be cut off from us. Wouldn't a new oil field nearer home, say in South America, be more certainly useful as a military reserve?

IT SEEMS TO ME

3. Unemployment compensation for every veteran who needs it.

4. Loans up to a limit of $1000 for part payment on the purchase of a home or a farm and farm equipment or a business property.

5. Hospitalization with authorization of new hospitals.

Administration of the measure is in the hands of the Veterans Administration which has the staff and the experience of over 20 years in dealing with veterans.

Under this bill soldiers will not be "dumped" out by the service, for it prohibits the discharge of any disabled soldier or sailor from active duty until adequate provision for his rehabilitation is made.
