

Holman Says White House Against Him

ROSEBURG, Ore., May 6 (AP)—Sen. Rufus Holman, seeking re-nomination, declared in a campaign speech here today that opposition to his candidacy is engineered from the White House.

"Labor racketeers," he said, "are forcing good Americans to pay tribute in the form of dues and initiation fees for the privilege of working to put arms into the hands of our fighting men."

Because I am against that sort of thing, the new deal took a man out of one of its multitudinous agencies to purge me from office."

He accused the Roosevelt administration of failure to prepare for war, claiming defense preparations were forced by the senate military affairs committee.

"The reason why Admiral Kimmel and General Short (US navy and army commanders at Pearl Harbor when that bastion was attacked by the Japanese on December 7, 1941) have not been court martialled is because 130 million people would rise in rage if they realized how the commander-in-chief had blundered," Holman asserted.

"I have been labeled isolationist, obstructionist, liar," the senator continued. "I resent such accusations. I have worked diligently for defense. I have urged restriction of immigration until our own people have jobs. I have fought against powers such as Haven demonstrated in the seizure of private business."

"If this be isolation, then I am an isolationist. I feel, personally, that it is Americanism."

Fire Is Checked In Silverton Home

The small daughter in the family was ill from measles in the room adjoining the closet and smelled the smoke. She called her mother who turned in the fire alarm. The Silverton fire department came out and managed to check the blaze before it spread to the rest of the house. Origin of the fire was undetermined.

Spanish Civil War Impresses International Journalist Most

The Spanish civil war impressed her more than any other experience in her life, but it didn't give her a nervous breakdown and the "normal" United States did just that, Lise Lindbaek, international journalist, confessed Friday in Salem.

Mrs. Lindbaek's only daughter, now 15 years old, is in Norway, where her mother sent her from Paris at the time of the fall of France. Mrs. Lindbaek, herself, has seen war practically from the front line trenches, first in Spain, later in France, and then in the Scandinavian countries and England. But she does not want the United States to develop a case of the jitters just to prove that it is conscious there is not peace. In fact, she admires the poise with which this nation produces trained fighters and the weapons of war in a calm manner.

"The west seems to me more awake to the war than do residents of New York—practically all of you here have someone in the Pacific," she observed.

How her first week end in this country, two years ago, started the shock which later terminated in a brief nervous breakdown was related freely, and without criticism, by the Salem visitor. "They (New Yorkers with whom I was staying) took me down to Philadelphia. And there for one whole week end not one word was said about the war; there was no mention of Europe. Now, I understand that they probably limited their conversation to save my feelings, but, then, I really was disturbed. 'What is wrong with them? Do they not realize what is the most important thing in the world today?' I asked myself."

Educated as an archaeologist, a newspaperwoman by later choice, Mrs. Lindbaek combines the common characteristic of the two professions and is a fact-finder at heart, she indicates. Having found the facts in Spain, where she went to "cover" the civil war, she joined the service of a Swedish relief organization and when the nazis marched in she was in France representing relief agencies succoring the Spanish refugees who were interned in a variety of establishments there, all described by her as "concentration camps."

"When these great United States receive 10,000 refugees within one year, you gasp. Think then," says she, "of France, into which poured in four days a half million Spanish men, women and children, all needing the material things of life."

Conditions in some of the camps were good because of the fair attitude of local French officials. On one island off the south coast, she said, 400 refugees went among the 6000 inhabitants. They were well-received and eventually so well-liked that merchants provided the Spanish school with needed stationery and other equipment, an unusual attitude in warring France, she intimates. However, deplorable housing, lack of food and clothing and desperate need were often prevalent.

Lack of union among the people of France and not just fascist leadership caused that country's downfall, Mrs. Lindbaek believes. France's inefficient form of government gave democracy a bad name; German propaganda was fuel to the flame of the Frenchman's traditional distrust of the British and many a citizen of France was willing to accept Hitler, she declares.
