Broken Seat On Tractor Throws Rider

SPRING VALLEY, Aug. 16.—A broken seat on a tractor on a Folk county farm on a quiet Sunday afternoon came near being as dangerous as front line combat duty for Leighton P. Holler, civilian aviation mechanic Portland airbase. A farmer by weekends, Holler was backing the tractor up to attach it to a tandem disc when the seat broke throwing him into the path of the oncoming tractor. The left spoked wheel passed over his chest and barely missed his head. In some unexplained manner the padded seat held the front wheel up enough so Holler crawled out before it rolled over him. His wife, the former Irene Windsor, happened to glance in his direction and ran to shut off the engine.

The injured man was removed by ambulance to a Salem hospital where it was found no bones were broken and he was taken back to the Folk county farm home of his father-in-law, Frank E. Windsor. His injuries are limited to deep gashes in his left arm and on his chin, and severe bruises. He will not be able to return to work for two weeks. Holler was transferred to the Portland air base from McChord Field. He has been accumulating farm machinery to work the upper Windsor island which he recently purchased from his father-in-law.

British Worry Over New V-2 Nazi Weapon

LONDON, Aug. 16.—(AP)—Flying bombs were hurled in artillery-like salvos at London and south England today and tonight, ending the dark-hour respite for the metropolitan area, as the public speculated on possible new terrors from improved rockets. "Is evacuation of women and children becoming even more urgent?" asked the London Evening News, alluding to public demands for more information about the nazis' new V-2 weapon. "Already 500 children have been killed and another 1000 injured, the paper said. There has been some consideration by censorship and security officials over the advisability of relaxing the present policy to give the public information on both flying bombs and rockets.

Dixon Tells Eye Witness Story Of Landings in South France

By KENNETH L. DIXON WITH ALLIED TROOPS ATTACKING SOUTHERN FRANCE, Aug. 15.—(AP)—Until a few hours before troops stormed ashore today in southern France, the coastal defenses of the underbelly of Hitler's Europa appeared about twice as tough as those encountered in Normandy, but the expected resistance failed to materialize. I watched the landings from a B-25 Mitchell bomber 1000 feet above the beaches. As far as 20 miles inland there was a constant lack of any sign of struggle to mark the entire rugged landscape. From my vantage point, it appeared that the new allied blows to liberate France were meeting almost no resistance in the first stages.

Preliminary reconnaissance indicated shore defenses would form a hard shell, not too well supported from behind. Twice during recent days I have flown over those defenses in reconnaissance planes. They were bristling with guns behind heavy emplacements. However, I saw few indications of strong defenses farther inland. It still seems incredible that we were not fired upon as we flew in with the gliders and parachute troops. It is also strange that the naval ships and landing craft unloading their cargoes of men and equipment should not be showered with enemy fire. Navy Does Good Job Apparently both the air forces and navy did a powerful job of neutralizing those shore defenses during the thundering three-hour bombardment before the landing assault. Along the entire coastal sector anti-aircraft batteries were so densely packed a few days ago that planes officially recorded flak as "intense." Yet no one aboard the plane from which I watched the assault saw a single shot fired or any sign of activity as the gliders landed. Pilots who carried parachute troops over also reported they encountered no fire, and all planes apparently returned safely.

Cracking of the outer shell was impossible until a few hours before the actual landings started. Similarly, although many bombing missions were flown over the assault area during the preliminary air stages, they were matched by other missions flown over other areas all along the entire southern French coast to confuse the Germans. But the time came during the final pre-invasion hours when the blow had to be struck. Then all available airpower poured high explosives on gun emplacements and all visible targets.

Behind the beach defenses lies higher ground to which the Nazi defenders might flee. Getting to those heights and cutting the enemy off was the main job of the airborne boys who dropped from the sky to help put pressure on the defense shell from the inside. There was unquestionably one of the toughest jobs of the entire operation. But even if the hard outer line of German defenses was cracked
