Blizzard-Like Snows Engulf Eastern U.S.

By the Associated Press

Riding on the tail of blizzard-like snows, the winter's most severe cold wave engulfed the northeast yesterday (Thursday), plunging temperatures to record-smashing below zero markings.

Seven deaths in New England and New York were attributed to the cold blast.

High winds, which accompanied the cold, whipped up snowdrifts in West Virginia, Pennsylvania and upper New York state, blocking roads, disrupting transportation, stranding automobiles and, in one case, marooning a school bus.

A sampling of morning temperatures throughout the area showed:

Cowlesville, N.Y., 32 below; Syracuse, -14.5, lowest on record there for this date; Albany, 12 below, and New York City, zero, coldest January 25 on record.

Aided by clear skies, thermometers inched upward during the day. In New York City, the temperature was 16 above during the afternoon. Weather officials looked for a break today (Friday).

Near Whitney Point, N.Y., the driver of a school bus that had been missing 24 hours walked nine miles through snowdrifts to report he had delivered 40 children safely before the bus was marooned. The driver spent the night in a farmhouse.

At Homer, N.Y., 30 draftees were stranded overnight. They had arrived on a night train to take army and navy physical examinations.
