Seeing Things Green and Yellow Vegetables Needed in Average American Diet

By Maxine Buren

We Americans have been found deficient in vitamin A, that mysterious little ingredient that helps the eyes adjust themselves quickly, aids so much in resistance to infection, promotes growth and is a good all round good health enthusiast.

Vitamin A certainly should not be lacking in Oregonians' diet, what with the markets full of fresh vegetables, just begging to be invited to dinner.

Butter which contains vitamin A is of course something special, but green and yellow vegetables may be served frequently on the table to provide the necessary ingredient, with no expenditure of ration points.

Such vegetables as broccoli, spinach, carrots, Swiss chard, kale and other greens, sweet potatoes and even good old winter squash will help along in getting the necessary quantity of vitamin A.

Speaking of vitamin A, here's something to make the eyes bright:

- SWEET POTATO-SPINACH CROQUETTES
- 3 cups mashed sweet potatoes
- 2 tablespoons melted butter or substitute
- 4 tablespoons scalded milk
- Dash of pepper
- 1/2 teaspoon salt
- 1 cup cooked spinach
- Fine cracker crumbs or corn-flakes
- 2 eggs slightly beaten
- 2 tablespoons cold cold water
- Add melted butter and milk to the potatoes, season and mix well. Make croquettes, filling the center of each with a little spinach. Roll in cracker crumbs then in egg beaten with the water and roll again in crumbs. Set aside to chill. Fry in deep fat and drain on paper or make into flatter cakes and fry in shallow fat.
- Apples and cabbage will make another dish to pep up the deficiency diet.
- Shred a small head of cabbage, 2 apples and an onion together, cover and cook until done, adding a dash of butter, salt and pepper, 1 tablespoon sugar or more, 1/2 cup vinegar a little before done.
- Here's a way to make squash the main dish, with just a little assistance from bacon.

Arrange bacon on top as it comes from the oven.
