Unarmed Salem Man Uncovers Jap 'Farmer,' Who Proves to Be Soldier, in Okinawa Cave

OKINAWA—(Delayed)—Finding a Jap army blanket in a cave is not unusual, but when Marine Sgt. Robert S. Osland, 29, of Salem, Ore., (former Oregon Statesman employee) felt someone pull it back into the cave as he started to walk away, the situation became embarrassing. Not only because he had uncovered a sleeping Jap in the nude, but because Osland had no weapon.

Expecting to be killed, the Jap made frantic gestures that he was an Okinawan farmer, a non-combatant, and sought with a dirty finger to point out callouses on the palm of his hand. Osland motioned the Jap to proceed him to camp, only 50 yards away.

Three other marines, also unarmed, decided that the cave should be more thoroughly searched. Sgt. Clarence W. Kammerer, 24, of Temple, Tex., armed himself with a broken banjo; Cpl. Joseph F. Desmond, 29, of San Francisco, picked up a fish spear, and Cpl. Douglas D. Jones, III, 28, Los Angeles, selected a stubby club.

Desmond jabbed into another pile of blankets with his spear. Out came two more nude men. They did not want to fight. Neither did they want to die. The marines marched them back, turned them over to the military police, and then breathed deep sighs of relief that they had encountered harmless farmers while without their weapons.

That night, however, a telephone call came from the military police lieutenant:

"Nice pick up, boys. These three Nips turned out to be soldiers who were a bit undecided about what to do. You found them just in time to make the decision for them. Thanks."

Cannery Labor Need Expected To Be Critical

The labor situation at the peak of the cannery season this summer promises to be critical, William J. Linfoot, personnel manager of United Growers, and chairman of the Salem Cannery committee, said as he summarized the conditions of the past week. Several of the canneries are now operating short-handed, and some are trying to expand their crews to meet the need for processing the berry and cherry crops, he said.

"When the beans start coming in and the late berries and fall fruits begin, all the canneries will be needing more help," Linfoot said. "There will be a real need this summer for 'victory' workers and vacation time workers."

Egbert Oliver, labor coordinator for the canners committee, has urged that all persons who may be interested in short shift or short period work in the canneries register now with their favorite plants or the U.S. employment service.
