Aurora Women Among Those to Hear About Making Things From Ragbag

By Maxine Buren

City women have many advantages over rural housewives, but here's one time when the farmer gets her innings.

I attended a meeting of the Aurora Woman's club on Wednesday with Marjorie Tye, energetic home demonstration agent for the county, and heard her give ideas and show examples of uses for things from the scrapbag. The meeting was at the home of Mrs. W. Russell, formerly of Salem.

Her entire collection of mittens, Dutch hats for little girls, pot holders, lapel pins and a dozen other items was original and clever and each piece had a professional look about it.

City women know how to sew and cut and glue, too, but most of them have not had the opportunity of hearing Miss Tye's illustrated talk on "Conserve with the scrapbag."

Biggest thing in the display, and the one I noticed Miss Tye saved until the last, is the footstool made from the very old fashioned system of using seven cans and covering them with felt. (We used to have a low one covered with carpet and buttoned down in the cutest way.)

Other ideas, and many of which you can get directions for at the extension office in the old high school building, are:

Mittens were made from an old coat and cuffed with ribbing from an old sweater, or were made from felt and decorated with applique pattern. (HE bulletin 1777.)

Two very cute Dutch hats for little girls, made from felt from old hats or new felt which may now be purchased at some stores. Bags to match that had a professional air. One woman told about making a bag for her little girl from an oatmeal box and covering it with felt.

An attractive dicky came from the tail of a man's shirt, was tucked in front and edged in rick-rack. The pattern was an ordinary one purchased from a store.

House slippers were made from a man's worn-out suit, and another from scraps of taffeta. Quilting several thicknesses of the material added strength and a professional appearance.

Pinking shears proved very handy for finishing felt mittens, with palms made from a pair of pants. These mittens were large and easily slipped on, decorated on the felt side with an applique design and used when putting wood in the fireplace.

Little felt horses with yellow yarn manes and tails made cute lapel pins. Felt tipped hampins would make excellent bazaar items to sell for a few cents.

The home demonstration agent has bulletins on most of these things, and his my advice to the women who want to make saleable items for pre-Christmas bazaars to get some of the ideas available through the county home demonstration agent.
