Pilots Confer On Air School Regulations

The state board of aeronautics has no direct authority over schools for the training of aviators including flight training, which shall be licensed by the state superintendent of public instruction as vocational schools for aeronautics training, Attorney General George Neuner held Wednesday.

It is the duty of the state aeronautics board, however, to prescribe and determine the nature and extent of the training necessary to enable persons trained in such schools to obtain pilot's licenses from the state of Oregon and such training must conform to the regulations of the board, Neuner said.

A group of aircraft service operators appeared before the state aeronautics board Wednesday, declaring that while they were not opposed to the law under which the state superintendent of public instruction licenses schools for aeronautics training, they hoped the regulations fixed by the board would be reasonable.

Business Would Suffer
Irving S. Allen, city attorney for Seaside and spokesman for the group, charged that too strenuous regulations by the board would result in putting many of the smaller aircraft operators out of business.

Board members, at the conclusion of the presentation by the aircraft service operators, indicated that they have no intention of adopting unreasonable regulations which would tend to seriously handicap the activities of the association and its members.

8 Schools Approved

Reports presented at the meeting showed that 8 municipal airfields at Vale was approved during May along with several schools under the GI bill of rights. These schools are located at Redmond, Klamath Falls, Pendleton, Ontario, Albany, Prineville, Salem and LaGrande.

Regulations of the board dealing with aeronautics training in the schools, with relation to issuance of pilot's licenses, probably will be adopted within a few days, board members indicated. Lee Eyerly, Salem, is president of the state aeronautics board.
