Council Votes

Restrictions At Silverton

SILVERTON—Restricting buildings on Adams street to those with a value of $2500 or over was voted Monday night by the city council. A bid submitted by Edward S. Woare at $450 for lot 16 in Parkside addition was rejected as the city felt more should be obtained. Application for liquor licenses were submitted by and Eugene Hart the council voted to recommend these applications to the state liquor commission.

Bus parking space on North Water street was discussed. The Greyhound bus disapproved of the East Side bus using the same parking space it was reported. The council decided to give additional space for the bus stop, as a safety measure and ask both lines to use the same location as parking space is at such a premium and buses stop at different hours.

The city manager, Robert Borland was authorized to buy the necessary steel posts needed for signs.

Louise and George Renan inspect a turkey picked at random from one of their many range flocks. This particular flock of 2500 is composed of four-month-old birds. Proper feeding and care, say the Renans, produce quality turkeys.

TURKEYS all the time

Turkey raising in Oregon has become a vast year 'round operation. No longer is this important and fast-growing industry thought of in terms of small turkey farms. The Renan Ranch, located on the rolling hills south of Oregon City, is an outstanding example of the Oregon turkey business grown up.

George and Louise Renan specialize in turkeys. On their ranch, flocks run... not into the hundreds... but into the thousands. Theirs is an extensive operation... and a profitable one.

Oregon turkey has become a preferred delicacy in all parts of the United States. The Renan Ranch, one of whose specialties is smoked turkey, ships thousands of pounds annually to all sections of the country. Enthusiastic customers everywhere, the Renans point out, no longer simply ask for turkey. They specify Oregon turkey because the very name Oregon has come to be associated with quality and delicacy of taste.

The superiority of Oregon turkey is due to many factors, the most important of these, however, say the Renans, is feeding. The Renan turkey ranchers have discovered, through many months of experimentation, the advantages of providing a liberal supply of ground alfalfa for their flocks.

One of the prime requisites for the growing of sturdy meat-producing birds is a rich supply of Vitamin A, which alfalfa supplies. This vitamin, the Renans have found, not only makes for vigorous flocks but builds up resistance to disease as well—a factor vital to successful turkey raising.

Expansive range lands and adequate shelter facilities, too, play a vital role in the development of choice turkey flocks. The Renan Ranch has an abundance of both.

George and Louise Renan, with one of the largest flocks in Oregon, have made a success of the turkey business. And, like many other successful turkey raisers in Oregon, they have profited from the assistance, advice, and all-out co-operation of the First National Bank of Portland.

The First National, keenly aware of the importance of the Oregon turkey industry, maintains a staff of two qualified field representatives who specialize exclusively in bank relations with turkey growers. Both men, Lewis C. Morse, with offices at Albany, and Arthur H. Moorhouse, located at Salem, are experienced in the turkey business. Both are ready at all times to give their personal assistance as well as the complete services of the First National to Oregon turkey raisers.

For helpful financial service bring your problems to the First National.

Scientifically constructed and maintained shelter facilities in sufficient number are essential to successful turkey raising, say the Renans. Here are a few of the mobile range sheds at the Renan Ranch.

Lewis C. Morse, First National Bank turkey representative, discusses the problems of turkey growing with George Renan on one of his visits to the Renan Ranch. The First National maintains two field representatives who work exclusively with turkey growers.
