House Plans Should Be Adjusted to Size of Woman Who Will Work There

By Maxine Buren
Woman's Editor, The Statesman

Little people, I am often reminded, are prone to talk right up as if they amounted to something.

Now this business of not getting their rights when houses are being planned or remodelled is really serious. A little woman should stand up for her convictions and not fooling.

Last week I heard from her own lips the story of how a very small woman had trouble convincing the carpenters that she wanted her kitchen work spaces a few inches lower than most. She argued that she is short and is going to use the tables and anyway she is paying the bills. They stubbornly held that 36 inches is "standard" and 36 inches the work counters would be, or else, even if she has to stand on a box to work. Well, some time after she had won the argument she was a little taken aback to find that they had put the door knobs all low, also for her convenience!

Now setting some things at odd heights is of course unnecessary, but a short person loses efficiency when arms and shoulders must be strained at the work table. A kneading board should be placed low enough to get good pressure on the dough, a shelf for egg beater and mixing bowl should be set for greatest ease in working. The sink too, should be low enough so that water does not run to elbows.

A few inches makes a great deal in working heights, so plan on just how high you do need the surfaces for greatest efficiency and start working on the project of getting your way.

There are other things about the house which should be gauged for a short woman. Shelves designed to hold oft-used things should be so she can reach them, at least from a short stepladder. Any light pulls should be within her reach and ironing boards should be low enough for comfortable working.

It's a strange fact that little folk do not like to reach, while tall ones have an aversion to stooping. Probably the tall women need a word of encouragement in planning their houses for added length too, but somehow we feel that they are more able to take care of themselves than the short ones, and would probably find greater sympathy from the carpenters.
