Ranch Ramblings By Rural Reporter

That Oregon is now producing two million pounds of chewing fescue seed, that this appears to be selling quite readily and that there is a million pounds still imported into the United States annually, were highlights at a meeting of Yamhill county seed growers at McMinnville recently. Meeting with them was H. B. Jackman, secretary of the Oregon Seed League, Louie Gross, county agent and Norton Taylor, assistant.

It was felt that the present acreage is safe and will probably be profitable in the future. The group favored the production of chewing fescue for seed over that of alta fescue as the acreage of alta fescue in Yamhill county is quite low for seed. There are many other counties in the state with very large acreages, it was pointed out.

J. E. Thompson, who ranches between Bend and Sisters, was in the valley recently to attend the Oregon Small Seed League and visit about a bit. Although Thompson raises alfalfa, it was interesting to learn the high esteem with which he regards rye for pasture and hay. Calves, said he, don't do so well on rye hay, but, after two years of age, his cattle do better on rye hay than on alfalfa. As proof of its value, last spring his 38 Durham cows, crossed with polled Hereford bulls, presented him with 39 polled calves, 34 of which were dropped in a period of 31 days.

The cows were wintered on rye hay fed on range, and surprising thing, said Thompson, was that the dry land hay was preferred to irrigated rye hay. He also said that the hay must not be cut in the bloom but when the plants have reached the state when they are a golden brown color.

Calves raised for market on the Thompson ranch are not allowed to lose their milk fat. They are placed in the feed lot at weaning and fed during the initial feeding period on chopped alfalfa and screenings. Mixed rye and barley are used for finishing along with molasses cubes which serve as appetizers.
