Mother's Helper

Waxed paper, kitchen standby for many many years, has so many practical uses that a whole column can be easily filled with them.

With 600 million pounds of waxed paper produced each year for American use, women of this continent do something besides wrap sandwiches with it.

Of course a great deal of this paper is used commercially, but let's look at some less familiar uses it may be put to in the home.

One of the most popular uses is for wrapping lettuce or other foods for refrigerator storage. The paper keeps moisture in, keeps it out. It protects against odors, protecting what's inside it, or sealing odors within. It's especially good for storing meats which may have grease. The wax keeps grease inside the package.

Here are some added suggestions, sent by the manufacturers of waxed paper, some you probably know, but there may be other new and interesting.
