School Artists to Exhibit Work

Student Drawings to Be on Display at Elfstrom's Galleries

The best of Salem public school artists' work will be on display today at the Elfstrom galleries. Paintings, drawings, and art displays from all of the city schools will be displayed. The exhibit is open to the public through May 16.

Art is taught in the elementary schools from the first grade to junior high, with an average of two and one half hours per week devoted to instruction and work. In junior high the pupils may elect to take either art or music, according to Mrs. George Jones, Salem schools art director. Art in senior high school is entirely elective.

Elementary students draw upon their own experiences, stories told them in class, or geography studies for their subjects. Mrs. Jones stated that first and second year students are the least inhibited in their drawing and produce many interesting pieces of art. Crayon, pastel, chalks, kalsomine and finger paint oils are used by elementary students.

Featured in the display are farm and barnyard scenes, landscapes, portraits, animals, still life, and imaginative studies of foreign scenes.
