"The Pacific Coast has its problems, too"

1. Every time you light the furnace, start your car, plug in the vacuum cleaner or step into an elevator, you consume energy. And since this energy furnishes heat and power that would otherwise have to come out of your own heart and muscles, the energy a people consume is pretty important.

2. On the Pacific Coast our three primary sources of energy are hydroelectric power, natural gas and petroleum. During 1940, the people of Washington, Oregon and California consumed more than 1 quadrillion, 46 trillion, 396 billion B. T. U.'s of energy from these three sources.

3. That means the average Pacific Coast person consumed enough energy in one form or another during 1940 to move a 15-car streamlined Diesel passenger train 195 miles. That's quite a bit of energy. But look what's happened since. By 1946 we had more tools to help us work — more money to help us live.

4. As a result, the average Pacific Coast person in 1946 consumed enough energy to move that same train 246 miles — an increase of 26%. On top of this, our population increased 30%. So more people, each using more energy, increased our total consumption 64%! If times had been normal, we could have built facilities to meet this demand.

5. But during the war, very little new construction on hydroelectric plants, steam plants, pipe lines, etc., was allowed. Consequently the Western oil industry has had to produce more petroleum this year than during the peak years of the war. And the Western utility companies have been scraping the bottom of the barrel.

6. So far, we've made out. In fact, we've increased the energy output on the Coast over 64% in 7 years — largely because our free, competitive American system has given all of us the incentive to increase that output. But our situation is typical of dislocations brought on all over this country by the war. These dislocations are no one's fault. But it is going to take the American people some time and some patience to work them out.

Dimensional Slips by Laros

Before the Laros Dimensional* System, was originated, slip designers used one basic pattern to fit all types of women. The only variation was in size and length. If a woman was disproportionate, she had to be content with a slip to fit her largest proportion, and then rely on some home alterations.

The Laros organization made a scientific, nationwide study of the feminine figure. They measured thousands of women. It was found that all normal figures could be grouped into nine basic types of three different lengths and three different proportions—the large-hip, the average-hip and the slim-hip types.

WHAT ALL THIS MEANS TO YOU

It means, in very plain language, that Laros has made a slip especially for YOU. When you buy your Laros Dimensional*, it fits perfectly. No alterations are ever necessary!

Sorry, no-mail or phone orders. You must come in to be fitted. After that you may order by mail or phone. . . . We want to fit you correctly.
