Vacationing in Late Summer Found Satisfactory If Weather Is Favorable

By Maxine Buren
Women's Editor, The Statesman

Reminiscences of a vacationer:

The states of Washington and Oregon furnish wide contrasts in scenery, offering views of high mountains, deep valleys, wide rivers, tiny mountain streamlets, barren wastelands and huge dams which will send water down to them.

As we drove along we were struck with the fact that Oregon's beautiful bridges were not designed for lovers of scenery. The view of the water below is invariably hidden by heavy concrete work along the bridge's sides. In Washington the railings have been placed low enough so the traveler may look over them to the water below.

The "unsafe to pass when white line is on your side" is a grand idea—but it defeats its purpose by not being placed at every danger spot. After some time, we figured that the marks are placed only on unsafe rises in the highway, but not on dangerous corners. Many of the lines on even the hillsides are now gone, so danger lurks more than if the lines were not expected by the tourists. Late travelers seem almost entirely older folk—with many out of state cars on the highway. We found hotel accommodations almost as scarce as in midsummer. Highways were filled with tourists.

One deep satisfaction—in 2,100 miles of driving in these two states, we saw evidence of only one accident—and that was within an hour of home.

Food is poor. Stopping at Longmires on Mt. Rainier, we found it so bad that we chose two cans of fruit eaten in picnic grounds as preferable to hotel fare. No food stores were in evidence in the park, so we ate the fruit which happened to be in the car.

A lunch at Timberline was more edible, but the view from the window was a thick sheet of rain which entirely obscured the mountain. The management at the Oregon mountain was much more friendly than the Washington lodge. Windows were boarded up at Sunrise lodge at Yakima park, the spot which commands a breathtaking view of several snow capped peaks, dominated by Mt. Rainier.

Menace to the traffic is the large trailer house, pulled by an inadequate car driven by a stubborn driver. A special driver's license should be required for those at the steering wheel of such trailers.

Too many logging trucks cause hazards, too. In the distance of 10 miles south of Kelso, Wash., we approached 19 logging and other heavy trucks, many with trailers. One place six were running so close together no car could have passed one at a time. Another truck had lost its trailer, veered across the road, dragging the logs a hundred feet, and coming to a stop on the left-hand side of the highway. No damage to traffic was in evidence, certainly with no credit going to a careless driver. A patrolman had him in charge, and rightly.

Late fall vacations are fine, one looks forward all summer to a holiday. The rush is over, and if weather favors, as it did us, the vacation is as successful as one dreams of.
