Real Silk Industry Is About to Stage a Comeback, Which Women to Welcome

By Maxine Buren
Statesman Woman's Editor

It will be real news for men and women that there is something being done about the development of the silk industry in America. During the war, rayons, celonese and other synthetic silks were accepted as a matter of course, and usually with good grace, but now that Japanese industry is again in the running, many are expressing desire for silk garments again.

The government, interested in helping rebuild Japan's economy, is undertaking to recreate an American silk industry and supply it with raw silk from Japan at a price which will make possible the sale of material at a reasonable cost.

Raw silk at the rate of 10,000 bales per month is scheduled for production this year, against that of 60,000 bales monthly before the war. But it is a beginning.

Among the difficulties offered is the fact that there are only one-fifth the number of looms in operation now as before, because so many converted to synthetics during the war. To reconvert to silk it is necessary, say spokesmen for the industry, to retain a corps of skilled workers. Synthetics can be woven automatically and require less skill from workers. In 1937, 430 factories manufacturing silk fabrics employed 46,700 persons.

Some silks are available at the better local yardgoods counters but the price is yet a bit too high to make them available to the average buyer. However the newer price is far below the very high prices of pure silks of a few years ago, when stores were forced to cut the price well below cost to even rid themselves of their stocks. Admittedly, the prices will have to come yet lower before
