Family Problems, Small Claims Evictions Head Legal Aid List

By Conrad Prange Staff Writer, The Statesman

Family problems, small claims and evictions lead the list of troubles laid at the doorstep of the infant Marion county legal aid clinic, ending its fourth month of operation today.

The clinic was begun here last October by the Marion County Bar association to give free legal aid to deserving people who could not afford attorney fees. It has been carried on in room 202 of the Willamette university law school building, with law student seniors as interviewers.

Although no actual count has been made of the number of contacts made to the office by persons in need of legal advice, Prof. Quinton Johnstone, law teacher and director of the clinic, said this week that "a great many" have been aided or advised by the clinic.

Most of the clinic's cases reach it from state and county welfare agencies, the district attorney's office, county judges, some minister groups, veteran agencies and juvenile institutions, Johnstone said. He expects the volume of work for the aid clinic to increase as it becomes better known.

Most of those coming to the clinic bring with them problems concerning divorce, adoptions, non-support and other marital difficulties. Attachments and small claims garnishments and evictions run a close second.

Far in the lead of cases the clinic receives but cannot handle are property, injury and probate claims. A majority of the divorce cases, or "contemplated divorce" cases, which come cannot be taken care of by the clinic because of an original rule barring such cases.

In such instances, Johnstone said, the couples are referred to attorneys or other county or state organizations or to a local minister for advice and consultation. In all other cases which the clinic cannot take care of it refers those involved to an attorney or to the correct contact agency.

Chief benefit of the clinic, Johnstone said, is that it gives to those who could not otherwise afford it, and it establishes a central agency for referral of such cases.
