New Buildings Scheduled for Girls' Camp

Construction of six new buildings at the Willamette valley Camp Fire girls' Kilowan camp at an estimated cost of $8,000 will get underway this spring, Dayle Burres, chairman of the Salem council camp committee, announced Saturday.

The camp, established 12 years ago on a 14-acre tract near Falls City, is a picturesque spot where thousands of Camp Fire girls have enjoyed summer vacations, but is definitely in need of improvement, Burres said.

Burres said plans are complete to raise $5,000 of the sum in Salem, while Corvallis and Dallas will supply the balance. Fred B. Ramsey, Dallas, is in charge of the committee working on the project.

A Bluebird lodge, complete with kitchen, fireplace and sleeping capacity of 20 is first on the building program and will be used for winter camping for which the camp now has no facilities.

Sale of Articles From Bush Home Planned

The Salem Art association is announcing the sale of some of the contents of the Sally Bush home, recently bought by the organization. The sale is to take place next Thursday, Friday and Saturday from 2 until 5 o'clock.

The organization purchased the contents of the home from Stuart Bush some weeks ago, and has set aside some furniture, bric-a-brac and chinaware not suited to an art museum, to which use the house will eventually be put.

An admission fee, which will be charged, may be applied on purchases of $5 or over. No children are to be admitted without adults.

Volunteer labor and materials to be purchased at minimum cost will be used because of the rustic nature of Kilowan camp. The camp now has facilities for 84 girls per week.
