Mills, alleged to have been present immediately after the assault; George Edwards and Max Houser, Salem city detectives, who interviewed Eoff; Dr. Vern Miller, who treated Mrs. Lillian Gardner, the alleged victim, and William Wilson, who guarded Eoff at a local hospital where he was taken following an attempted suicide in Marion county jail.

Keep Oregon Green Drive To Start Soon

The annual forest fire prevention program of the Keep Oregon Green association will soon get under way in Marion county, it was reported Tuesday by County Judge Grant Murphy, who has been reappointed chairman for this county.

A campaign to warn persons, especially motorists and campers, against the dangers of careless fire protection, will be waged through posters, news stories, paid advertisements, radio announcements and through local chairmen.

Judge Murphy said Monday that he had yet to appoint this county's 24 committee members from various communities, who will carry on the work in their own areas.

Paul M. Dunn, Corvallis, dean of the Oregon State College school of forestry, was renamed state chairman of the state association at the 14-man board of trustees meeting in Portland last week.

Charles Ogle of Salem was continued as full-time secretary with offices in Salem at the Keep Oregon Green association headquarters. Trustees include Dunn and Nelson Rogers of Salem.

Dunn said that greatly increased use of Oregon forests and outdoor regions will add to the existing fire dangers. He urged motorists to avoid tossing burning cigarettes out of cars into dry roadside grass, asked campers to drown camp fires when leaving camp and to avoid smoking while walking or riding in forest and range areas.

County Lacks Quarters for Mentally Ill

Several Marion county officials Tuesday took exception to a statement reportedly made by the Oregon Mental Hygiene society Monday indicating that mental patients awaiting hearings in Salem "have access to proper" quarters.

According to an Associated Press dispatch the society reported that only a few Oregon counties are able to suitably house mental patients awaiting hearings. The society, the dispatch said, noted that Multnomah county and those close to the state hospitals at Salem and Pendleton have access to "proper" quarters, while "others depend on jails."

"Our being in the same city with the state institutions gives us no advantage over other counties whatsoever," Marion County Judge Grant Murphy said.

"We cannot commit mental patients to the state hospital without court orders," he said. "This law, passed by the 1947 legislature, binds Marion county as well as any other county."

Dr. Frank Siler, Marion county health officer, said that mental patients in Marion county had to be lodged in the county jail or in their homes until court hearings were held on them.

The Oregon Mental Hygiene society report Monday recommended inclusion of special sound proof rooms for mental cases in the construction of general hospitals built in the future. Existing hospitals were asked to provide similar rooms.

Mystery of the Heat Pump

The seeming paradox of obtaining heat from "cold" the common term for lack of heat, by means of the heat pump or reverse cycle refrigeration, has but recently been introduced here and is being installed in the Oregonian's new building. It will be discussed Wednesday evening in non-technical language at part of the Benson State Air Conditioning conference, sponsored by the Oregon chapter of the American Society of Heating and Ventilating Engineers.

The heat pump seems paradoxical only because of common misconceptions and loose usage of terms. Heat is a quantity as distinguished from temperature, which is a level or intensity. We think of heat being present in objects warmer than room temperature, when actually there is recoverable heat in any object having a temperature greater than 459.8 degrees below Fahrenheit zero. A heat pump is a device which can extract heat from materials of relatively low temperatures and discharge it as a quantity of heat at a temperature high to be useful for heating buildings.

A refrigeration machine is one which does useful work in extracting heat and delivers the heat to a material such as water or air, which is then wasted. The heat pump does useful work in supplying heat to a space after extracting this heat from a medium such as water or air, which is then wasted. Since this is the reverse of normal refrigeration processes, the heat pump is often referred to as reverse cycle refrigeration.

The Oregonian's new building will have the largest heat pump installation in the country. Heat will be extracted from well water at 58 degrees. This heat will be delivered to circulated water at about 125 degrees and used in conventional panel heating and air heating of the new structure. The Equitable building is equipped with a somewhat similar system, which has heated that structure since last December. Some fifty residential installations in the Portland area, all using the heat pump in operation or under construction.

Heat pumps being generally driven by electric motors have developed wide interest and gained some acceptance here due to rising fuel costs and low electric rates. Since the heat pump is only about one-third of the total amount of heat supplied, the heat pump offers heating costs about one-third those of normal electric heating. However, first cost of equipment is still high.

The talk on the heat pump will be given in the first session for the public. A second evening session, Thursday, will discuss trends in heating, the future of fuels in this region, and advances made in heating systems, such as radiant panels, air conditioning, and new boiler and furnace equipment, with predictions of things to come. In addition, the exhibition will be to the public daily beginning Thursday and continuing equipment by some forty local distributors and contractors. Some of the exhibits have been sent directly from the society's international exposition in New York last month.

The conference this week is the first on air conditioning brought to Portland. Oregon chapter is to be congratulated for its public spirit in presenting it here.
