Boycott Ruying Effects Small Here, Believed

Salem's organized labor will not be affected "in the immediate future" by action of a Portland circuit court judge, who Saturday ruled that Oregon's ban on secondary labor boycotts was unconstitutional. Herbert Barker, executive secretary of the Salem trades and labor council, said Monday.

"No local labor-management negotiations involving secondary boycotts or hot cargos are in operation now," Barker said. "Even in the past Salem unions have had few occasions to use pickets in such disputes. Now that the air has been cleared again, I believe that even fewer labor-management disputes will come about."

Portland Circuit Judge Charles W. Redding, in making the ruling last week, said that the law (secondary boycott ban), in effect forbids workers involved in a labor dispute to gain support from their side by publicizing the disagreement.

Such a ban on publicizing a dispute, Redding said, infringes on the constitutional guarantee of freedom of speech and press. The judge made the ruling in denying the injunction asked by a Portland coffee shop. The shop, which employs non-union waitresses, has been picketed by a waitress and cafeteria woman's union.

The boycott law was passed by the 1947 legislature. Barker added that not many unions in Salem are in industries where secondary boycotts become involved in negotiations.

In Salem Memorial hospital in "fair" condition Monday night was Mrs. Berste M. Hyland, 1165 Madison st. First aid attendants who took her to the hospital said she was suffering from two severe face cuts and shock.

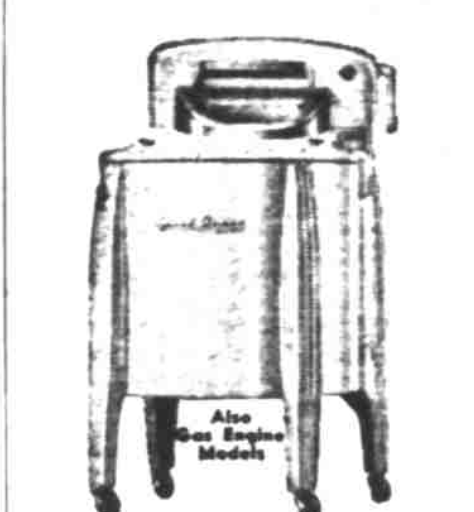

City police said the accident occurred when Mrs. Hyland's auto and one driven by Philip H. Both cars were extensively damaged but only Mrs. Hyland suffered injuries, police said.
