Most for the Least Steak Dinner Can Be the Ground Kind And Still Make a Good Impression

By Maxine Buren
Statesman Women Editor

Whenever we think of steak and mushrooms for dinner, we recall an invitation from a friend to come over for "steak and mushrooms." Though the friend thought she was playing a practical joke, and was fooled later by accepting an invitation to a fish dinner (on a Monday after we were known to have been on a weekend fishing trip) and being served creamed tuna, the steak and mushroom proved as much to our liking as any fillet mignon and hot-house grown "rooms."

Hamburger steak, or rather, ground beef (for we recommend paying a bit more for recognizable meat) can become glamorous. It doesn't take an expert to see that it's the grade of meat not the cut, that makes the difference when the meat's ground. Just be sure you buy from a man who's to be trusted, for he certainly has you in his power.

One should not expect, or even want to buy porthouse and have it ground, for after grinding the meat's bound to be tender, and the tougher cuts make good meat when prepared in this way.

Chuck, round or flank make fine meat cakes, or your butcher may offer pure ground beef which he trims from more expensive cuts. That is the meat to buy for cakes or meat loaves.

Some women like their meat put through the grinder twice. A Swedish meat balls, cooked in the morning while the weather is moderate, can be reheated in the evening and is even better than if fresh cooked.

Meat balls and macaroni or rice are popular for midsummer picnics. Beef cakes can be glamorized and made to please the entire family, when special accessories are put on the table for choice among the diners. A small bowl of chopped or sliced onions, some relishes, tomatoes and perhaps olives for garnishing, heated beans and mayonnaise are on hand, so each diner can make his own to personal taste.
