Gardening Today

Most gardeners, judging from the number of inquiries I receive, are familiar with at least some varieties of the maggots which attack the roots of a large percentage of our growing things here in the northwest. The earliest varieties of the insect was introduced from Europe, we are told, early in the 19th Century and is now distributed widely over North America and Canada. The common variety passes the winter as a pupa in a hard brown egg-shaped capsule, about 1/4 inch long, which is buried from one to five inches in the soil. In the spring, about the time early cabbage plants are being set out, the capsule is broken and a small gray fly crawls out of the soil. These flies resemble the common housefly in appearance but are only about half as long. They stay close to the earth and deposit their small white eggs on the plants near where the stem meets the ground or in the cracks and crevices in the soil. From three to seven days and the small maggots are hatched, promptly seeking the roots of the host plants. The larvae reach maturity in from three to four weeks, and begin all over again. There are four or five generations of the fly each year. Which help to keep the gardener busy.

"Herbert had his heart set on an autogiro but mine was set on new International Sterling."
"So we just compromised and bought all new International Sterling
from HOLLY JACKSON."
"Yes, folks, that's married life, fifty-fifty on everything (wife gets both fifties). Give 'nd Take, she gives it and you take it. But brother you can't change the whole world so just as well fit into the picture gracefully and when your wife comes in and buys her International Sterling, just pay the bill and smile (like you really enjoyed it) and I promise I'll be just as easy on you as she will permit me to be." (Boy, I really stepped over and around that one.)
