State Parole Officers Seek Job For Violator Giving Up Here

State parole officers Monday were attempting to secure a job for a Michigan parole violator who, tired, wet and hungry, walked into Salem state police headquarters Sunday to give himself up.

"After that I knew I had broken parole and worked numerous jobs for short periods," he stated. "I never could stay long, though, because they'd catch up with me. I felt like a hunted man every minute."

Rivers said he arrived in Salem Sunday, broke and hungry. He placed his small bundle of worldly goods in a locker at the bus depot and lost the key. When he returned they were gone.

He told police he became completely discouraged Sunday and walked to state police headquarters in the rain. Here police told Rivers they could not jail him until his story were checked. The officers, however, "chipped in" and staked him to meals and a room.
