Inventory of Fruit in Closet Helps Apportion Out Weekly Amounts to Use

By Maxine Buren
Statesman Woman's Editor

We girls should go businesslike on the matter of using the canned fruit supply.

Looking at the calendar we find that there are 25 weeks from Nov. 1 to May 1.

To go about the thing in a business way, so there won't be fruit left over, or we won't find ourselves out of certain kinds too early in the season, we should take inventory of the canned goods.

It won't take but a few minutes (if you don't already have a list) to count the canned fruit and at least estimate the frozen. Then make a schedule of how much of each kind we can allow per week and come out even in the spring.

There's another factor too—best to go a little heavier on the early fruits and light on the late ones. Strawberries, for instance, may be coming along fresh by May, and to our way of thinking, we should leave a strawberryless interval of at least a month to whet our appetites for better appreciation of the fresh berries.

There's such a thing as losing appreciation of some of the most delicious products if we have them the entire year around.

Then there's the subject of appeasance. Most of us now have apples from some source fresh in the box. Some have grown them, others make good buys from growers. Saving the canned sauce is a good business move, using the fresh ones while they're at their best.

Pears are about the same as apples, except that we usually have fewer pears on hand, but remember, the canned ones will keep but the fresh ones won't.

We worked out a system which seems practical. We put out a certain number of jars of each fruit,
