SANTA'S SNOWMAN

CHAPTER 10

Riding the Stars

There isn't any use in your hunting for the Wishing Pool because it isn't there any more as you soon will see.

But it was there once, in a land far away, so far you could never have found your way there no, even with thirteen maps and a compass, too.

Listen, now, and you'll know why.

The four Santa Land brownies, Lance, Hugo, Hubert and Pudding, went hurtling through the night with Danny and the Snow Man stumbling after as fast as they could. Pretty soon they were out of Santa Land and it's too bad it was so dark else they would have seen Flournoy, the evil elf, who crept up behind them as soon as they had crossed the line.

The wicked creature chuckled to himself when he heard Danny gasp as he ran.

"Ha!" thought Flournoy. "I guess the sight of that leg broke Santa's best! I'll just trail along and be up too! I'll just trail along and see."

What they were up to is something you almost wouldn't believe: the four brownies stopped and planted seeds.

"What about the Snow Man and the boy?" asked Lance tamping down the ground over his seed. "We have only four seeds."

"Shucks," said Pudding. "The boy can ride with me."

"And the Snow Man with me," said Hubert.

Then quickly Pudding took Danny's hand and Hubert grabbed the Snow Man's arm. Not a minute too soon, either, for suddenly the four seeds sent forth sprouts that burst into the air at an amazing speed carrying the brownies and their friends up, up, up--oh, I don't know how many miles into the midnight sky.

But don't imagine Flournoy had been left behind. Not he! For he very quickly understood what the brownies were planting and caught at the topmost stem of Lance's sprout so that he himself was carried before all the others into the sky.

Danny clung to his sprout with one hand and with the other he gripped Pudding's shirt. The air whoshed by him and the black night got into his mouth and into his eyes and he couldn't have cried out even if he'd wanted to.

But he did wish he knew where they were going and how much longer he was going to be shot into the air. For surely, he thought, we're going to hang against the top of the sky any minute.

Just about that time, the sprout stopped growing. There Pudding and Danny were, clinging to a vine in a sea of stars.

It was easier to see with all those stars turned on and Danny didn't have any trouble spying the Snow Man hanging to Hubert's sprout nearby and looking scared and breathless as a snow white polar bear that has been in the water too long.

But no one saw Flournoy on top of Lance's sprout. The creature was dark and tiny and would have been hard to find even had one been searching for him.

"Now," yelled Lance. "Grab yourselves a shooting star and we'll all meet in Platonia!"

With that the tiny brownie flung himself from his sprout and landed on the back of a falling star. Hugo leaped for another star and Hubert and Pudding followed after.

"I'm afraid," said the Snow Man and you could hear his teeth chattering all over the sky.

"I am, too," said Danny. "But we can't stay here, that's certain. Look, here comes a big one! Let's get it together!"

Sure enough, an enormous shooting star was coming their way. Catching his breath Danny leaped for it as it passed below. The Snow Man who just couldn't be left behind, leaped, too, and now they were carried out of the sky even faster than they had gone into it.

But where were they falling to? Truly, they were too terrified to care!
