Your Health

Until recently, deep and severe frostbite always carried with it the danger of amputation. Where freezing was extensive, only the most timely treatment, plus a lot of good luck, could prevent gangrene or death of the tissue. This was due, not only to the damage to the blood vessels by the frostbite but also to the tendency of the blood to clot in the damaged parts even after they had been thawed out, thus stopping circulation.

Today, however, a recently-discovered drug called heparin has given us a wonderfully successful method of dealing with such injuries. Heparin has the effect of slowing down the clotting of the blood; thus circulation to the affected part is restored because the blood flows more easily through the affected areas and gangrene is prevented.

Treatment must be begun within 48 hours after frostbite and continued for from seven to nine days if it is to be successful. It is also very important that during this time the affected part be kept at normal room temperature.

The heparin is given slowly by injection into a vein once each day for several days. Every twelve hours the clotting time of the blood is determined, and an effort is made to keep this clotting time between thirty to sixty minutes instead of the normal three to five minutes.

Frostbitten tissues are extremely susceptible to infection; hence, the parts must be kept dressed under sterile conditions with precautions much the same as those used in the treatment of burns.

When the skin is blistered and areas of the skin are lost, dressings of a penicillin solution may be applied. In two patients with severe frostbite, treated in the way described, no tissues were lost except the nails.

Experiments have been carried out to show the value of the heparin treatment. For example, the legs of animals were frozen. If the heparin was not employed, the legs became gangrenous, but when the heparin was used, even a slight degree of gangrene was unusual.

Human volunteers were exposed, for from ten to thirty minutes, to dry ice on the skin. The frostbitten areas, if the heparin was not used, became gangrenous. Immediate treatment with heparin, continued for six days, prevented any loss of tissues, and even when treatment was delayed for twenty-four hours, it was almost as effective.

It is important, therefore, that the tissues be kept at room temperature before the heparin treatment is started, and during the treatment, since keeping the body either too warm or too cold before the heparin is injected may cause even more damage to the affected parts than the frostbite itself.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

R. G.: What are cataracts?
Answer: A cataract consists of an opacity in the lens of the eye so that the light rays are unable to pass through the lens. Cataracts occur as a result of injuries, as well as from certain infections. Up to the present time, no cure for cataracts has been discovered other than operation, with removal of the lens.

Hollywood On Parade

HOLLYWOOD—Have yourself a grand time. Go to see a sock-oh-romantic comedy called "A Letter to Three Wives."

Jeanne Crain, Linda Darnell, and Ann Sothern are chums in a suburban country-club set. Embarking on a riverboat excursion with settlement-house kids one day, they learn that one of their husbands—they don't know which one—has run off with the town belle, Addie Ross. Addie's voice, as narrator, is supplied by Celeste Holm.

Cut off from the telephone for the day, the three wives can only speculate, in flashback: Was it my husband? Jeanne recalls her first horrible meeting with the country-club gang, when a fake flower flew off her dress, exposing a gap. And her husband, Jeffrey Lynn, always did admire Addie.

Linda, a girl from over the tracks, recalls her gruff courtship by the department-store magnate, Paul Douglas. Ann, a soap-opera writer, remembers how her school-teacher husband, Kirk Douglas, sounded off in front of her boss
