Popcorn Takes Place in Kitchen for Other Reasons Than Refreshment

Pop corn, it seems, is more than just something with which to disturb the man in front of you at the movie. It makes cookies, candies and even pudding.

For years we have (when we happened to think of it) known that pop corn tastes good when floating on hot soup. We've used it of course for a confection in the form of pop corn balls and to decorate the Christmas tree.

But now comes to our desk a booklet giving a number of suggestions for the use of pop corn other than in its own crispy and fascinating natural state.

Some of the ideas sound pretty good, others seem like someone was trying awfully hard to find recipes to use pop corn.

Several recipes are given for pop corn balls, one suggests that marshmallows be arranged in layers between the layers of popcorn, and heated in a skillet until the marshmallows are partially browned, then the mass be formed into balls.

Another recipe for balls includes peanuts.

The booklet suggests that to make a cheesy snack you melt 1/2 cup grated cheese and 1/2 cup butter and pour over 2 quarts popped, buttered corn. The corn should be stirred so every kernel will be coated with the cheese. The recipes for pudding, cookies and muffins call for corn run through the coarse knife on the meat grinder.

POP CORN COOKIES
2 cups flour
4 teaspoons baking powder
1 teaspoon salt
1 1/2 teaspoons nutmeg
1/2 cup melted fat
1 cup sugar
1/2 cup molasses
1 egg well beaten
1 cup ground popped corn
1 cup dried pears or prunes
Sift flour, baking powder, salt and nutmeg together, cream shortening and sugar. Add molasses and egg. Add flour mixture alternating with milk. Add popped corn and fruit that has been cut in pieces. Roll to 1/4 inch thick, cut and bake on oiled sheet at 425 for about 12 minutes.

Here too is a recipe for caramelized corn, supposedly like that you buy down town, though we've never tried it.

CARAMEL CORN
1 cup white sugar
1/2 cup corn syrup
2 tablespoons sorghum
1/2 cup water
1/2 tablespoon butter
1/2 tablespoon vinegar
2 quarts popped corn
Combine all ingredients but corn, cook until syrup becomes brittle when tested in cold water, pour, so all pieces will be coated. Turn out on buttered plate. We would use molasses if the sorghum is not available.
